POLICE DOG PUPPIES.

Sired by MATERNHOF CHLODWIG VON DER MAINHOEHE, German reg. 74429, registered and certified by the U. S. Bureau of Animal Industry as a pure-bred German Shepherd stud dog after filing the necessary European papers identical with those required by the A. K. C. for registration. The U. S. government, Washington, returned those papers to me through my agents, Gu Barham Co., Los Angeles, but were mislaid due to my severe illness and absence from home since Sept 1, and that is the only reason why I have not applied for registration with A. K. C., to which he is without question eligible. Therefore, malicious and untrue reports from irresponsible and envious persons that Champ. Chlodwig could not be registered becaus not pure bred are ridiculous, the same as that he is not a sure breeder. During the past 11 months he was only bred to 14 bitches, every one of which produced a litter and averaging almost nine puppies each. However, I have absolutely refused to breed to 22 other bitches on account of bad type, immature age, etc. All his and the fact that Champ Chlodwig has won hands down at all of the important shows, 5 times in succession and under the greatest competition ever known in California, defeating every dog of importance on the Coast in all competitive classes, caused those furious and untrue reports to be made. In justice to the serious minded breeders who wanted to improve the breed and who have litters by this really wonderful dog, who, according to the judges and experts, is in a class by himself, I make the above statement. Being the oldest and best known breeder, exhibitor and fancier of Police Dogs on the Pacific Coast who has spared no expense to bring the best dog suitable for breeding purposes direct from Europe to the Coast and who has the highest honors in Germany and Holland for show and breeding purposes, I certainly would not import an animal that could not be registered. The following breeders have puppies for sale sired by Champion Chlodwig:

Mrs. James Keeney, Irwindale, Cal.; Mrs. Marie Vorbeck, 200 New ave., Monterey Park; Mrs. Geo. Reed, Sunland, Cal.; O. J. Villon, 75 Fig Str., Altadena; E. H. Scheele, 8 Mountain View ave., Altadena; Jos. March, Los Angeles; C. B. Russell, Norwalk; F. E. Armstrong, Las Vegas, Arizona; F. B. Cyriacks, Lankershim, Cal.; Geo. Paid the Landlord

He was in love with his wife, but was careless about money matters. He started off for a long business trip promising to send her a check for the board bill, which he forgot to do. Her hotel bill became due and she telegraphed: "Dead broke. Landlord insistent. Wire me money." Her husband answered: "Wait a few days. Am short myself. Will send check in a few days. A thousand kisses." The wife was exasperated. She telegraphed back: "Never mind money. Gave landlord some of the kisses. He seems satisfied."—[Chicago News.

Big Theater for Austria

A million-dollar theater, a rival to the Wagner Theater at Bayreuth, is to be built at Salzburg, Austria, the birthplace of Mozart. Mozart festivals will be held there under the auspices of international admirers of the master's music. If the spirit of Mozart was present at the laying of the corner-stone last summer, he must have smiled with gentle cynicism, says E. Doee in the Mentor Magazine, for the great musician went without recognition from his native place even after he had been recognized elsewhere. —[Indianapolis News.

Nebuchadnezzar's Motive

"In 579 B.C.," stated the professor to the history class, "Nebuchadnezzar captured Tyre. Now can any one of you tell what reason he could have had for doing this?"

There was no delay for a reply.

"He probably wanted it for his chariot," answered the bright young man of the class. —[Chicago News.

Acting a Lost Art

London has a First Nighters Club and at a recent meeting St. John Ervine, the president, said:

"The British theater is very near its last grasp. I sometimes wonder whether we know what acting is. We see people from the higher ranks of the middle classes and the lower ranks of aristocracy walking very prettily across the stage, numbling their words. The audiences do not know what acting is like, and one sees them going into raptures over dreadful performances."

STAND ON RHINE ARMY PRAISED

Senator Pepper Favors Government Action

Says Europe Must Not Count on Our Guns

French Policy in Ruhr Called American in Type

[BY A. P. NIGHT WIRE.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 13.—The withdrawal of American troops from the Rhineland is not a suggestion that the United States purposes to remain aloof from world affairs, but "an emphatic declaration on our part that Europe must not count on American guns in the readjustment of its problems" Senator George Wharton Pepper of Pennsylvania, declared here today.

"We may go back there," he asserted, "but God grant that it never may be necessary. Meanwhile, what we can do must be done otherwise than through the output of military force."

The Senator addressed 1400 members of the Woman's National Republican Club, observing its second anniversary.

WADSWORTH DIFFERS

James W. Wadsworth, Jr., United States Senator from New York, opposed Senator Pepper's views concerning the wisdom of withdrawing the troops, on the ground it might give Europe the impression we were "withdrawing in a panic."

"My plea is that America comport herself with a level head and avoid all signs of panic," he declared. "It yet may fall to our lot to help solve the problem and for that reason we should avoid the appearance of panic. Moreover, we should insure a self-respect and order at home before we can set an example to the world."

"I have no disposition to form or express judgment as to its outcome," said Senator Pepper in reference to French occupation of the Ruhr. "But I say this: that knowing, as we do, through what things France has passed—how she passed through great tribulations and washed her robes in blood—that it is easy to see how the flaming spirit of the people has at last become too impatient longer to wait while others try to solve her problems, and she has taken the solution of them into her own hands."

FAVORS RUHR POLICY

"What America can do in the matter, and how she shall do it," he continued, "can better be determined when the air has been cleared by what will follow from France's occupation of the Ruhr."

"For," he declared with emphasis, "the air will be cleared.

"Whatever the outcome may be, it is at least thinkable to me, that under the same circumstances, whether wisely or unwisely, it would not have been untrue to American type if we had done the same thing."

MONTEREY WET ISSUE UNSETTLED

Coast Guard Commander Peevish About Publicity Given Howell Incident

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 13.—Angered because of asserted misquotations of his statement, G. C. Carmine, division commander of the Coast Guard, today refused to say whether he had received from Mayor Daugherty of Monterey a long letter complaining against the action of Capt. C. F. Howell of the revenue cutter Shawnee, who in a conference with officials of that city ten days ago told them they ought to enforce the prohibition amendment.

"I will not say whether I got a five-page letter or a ten-page letter," declared Commander Carmine, vehemently, "or any kind of a letter. Let Mr. Daugherty give out what he wrote. I decline to discuss the matter in any way.

"I have been quoted as saying the Monterey incident was closed. I did not say it was closed. I said it was closed as far as giving any statement to the newspapers was concerned."

The 3rd inst. the Coast Guard cutter Shawnee steamed into Monterey Harbor and Capt. Howell at once went into conference with city officials and prominent citizens regarding enforcement of the liquor laws. Capt. Howell said he has been informed the town was quite "wet" and he told the officials they should dry it up, and threatened Federal action unless conditions were improved. His remarks were resented by Mayor Daugherty and by the Monterey Chamber of Commerce.

JUANITA OR JANE? SHE DENIES ALL

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 13.—The case of Miss Jane Hansen, actress and asserted drug addict, who the police say is Juanita Hansen, the film star, came up again in the West Side Court today before Magistrate McAndrews. Miss Hansen, arrested early Thursday morning in an apartment at 29 West Eighty-first street, did not appear at the hearing to answer to the charge of possessing narcotics. Friends told the court she was under the care of physicians, and the magistrate adjourned the case until next Wednesday. Miss Hansen's bail of $300, posted by a young man who refused to give his name, was continued.

The police consented to the delay, explaining it would give them time to get a report from the analyst on the powders found in the Eighty-first-street flat. It is asserted the actress had a pill box of cocaine and a hypodermic needle conveniently near by on the couch on which she reposed in night dress. Miss Hansen charges a "frame-up" on the part of the police, and says enemies are seeking to ruin her theatrical career.

The mystery with which the actress has surrounded her identity continued unsolved today. She had denied she was the well-known screen favorite, but according to the police she declared herself to be Juanita Hansen when questioned by them, and Magistrate McQuade, before whom she originally was arraigned, said she admitted her identity as the screen star to him in private. She is registered at the McAlpin Hotel, but was said today to be at the Eighty-first street flat. The apartment at that address is rented in the name of Mrs. Ruth Barnet, a former actress and friends of Miss Hansen.

HIS LOVE TROUBLES ARE HEAVY

Spoonemore Declares Former Parents-in-Law Keep His ex-Wife From Him

By a "Times" Staff Correspondent

LONG BEACH, Jan. 13.—What is thought to be the last word in matrimonial troubles was revealed here today in the arrest of W. A. Spoonemore, charged with committing a statutory offense against the woman whom he has twice married and from whom he has twice been divorced.

The arrest of Spoonemore was effected this afternoon by Constable C. R. Thomas, following a complaint by Mrs. Katherine Wipperman of 504 South Magnolia street, Monrovia.

Asserting that his former wife would remarry him if her parents would let her alone, Spoonemore complained bitterly to local officers about the trials of his married life which began soon after his first marriage to Miss Wipperman in Iowa in 1916.

He says that he left for Montana to establish a homestead and that, in his absence, his wife's parents persuaded her to get a divorce. She did this but remarried him upon his return in December of the same year.

Then followed a second divorce, again at the instance of his wife's parents, and since that time he has been visiting his wife's home to see their 5-year-old daughter.

He says that it was to see his daughter that he made the trip to Long Beach today.

PROHIBITION CHIEF ON INSPECTION TRIP

COMMISSIONER HAYNES WANTS TO WORK OUT BETTER ENFORCEMENT

[BY A. P. NIGHT WIRE.]

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Prohibition Commissioner Haynes, accompanied by representatives of the legal and narcotic divisions of the bureau, left Washington tonight on an inspection trip through the western and southwestern States which is planned to comprise a thorough investigation of the Federal agencies for enforcing prohibition and antinarcotic laws.

In the commissioner's party were L. G. Nutt, chief of the narcotic section, and H. W. Orcutt of the bureau's legal staff. After a brief stop in Chicago, which is expected to be connected with reported imminent changes in the office of the State director, Mr. Haynes will proceed to Portland, Or., where he is scheduled to make a public address the 17th inst.

The purpose of the tour, it was declared officially tonight, was to attempt to work out methods of better co-operation among the field forces of the bureau and between these and the law-enforcement engencies of the various States. Mr. Haynes said a similar journey through the South Atlantic States had impressed him with the benefit derived from personal contact with State officials.

The itinerary includes stops at ten cities and conferences already have been arranged at each place with Federal, State and municipal officials for discussion of more rigid enforcement of the prohibition laws.

Schools of instruction also will be conducted by Mr. Nutt and Mr. Orcutt with State and municipal officials charged with enforcement of the narcotic laws and prosecution of cases.

URGE OPEN DOORS FOR REFUGEES

Armenian Turk Victims Are Aimed at in Bill

Lifting of Quota Ban is Sought by Colt

Immigrant Health Tests Not to be Ignored

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Vigorous efforts will be made by the Senate Committee on Immigration, of which Senator Colt is chairman, to obtain passage at this session of Congress of a Near East refugee immigration bill, although the House committee has declined to act on this legislation. At a meeting of Senator Colt's committee today, Senator Sterling was instructed to report, somewhat amended, the Keyes refugee bill.

The principal amendment is one limiting benefits to Armenians. The proviso reads:

"That when used in this act, the term 'refugee' shall mean any person of the Armenian race who can show that he has fled from his home on reasonable apprehension of death or bodily injury at the hands of Turkish troops or the Turkish civilian populace since the first of August, 1914, and was resident prior to fleeing from his home in territory now occupied by the Turkish military or civil authorities."

Another important amendment embodied in the bill are provisions of a measure introduced by Senator Williams of Mississippi. This admits into the United States, in addition to the other refugees, 25,000 orphans or homeless Armenian children who now are being cared for by the Near East relief, American Red Cross or some other kindred philanthropic organization. To be admissible they must be under 16 years of age and must conform, as do all other refugees under the bill, to all requirements of the immigration laws except that they are in addition to national quotas.

An important further provision written into the bill follows:

"That the admissibility to the United States of refugees under this act shall, so far as feasible, be determined prior to embarkation of such refugees at a foreign port. To that end, officers of the United States immigration service and the United States public health service may be detailed for service abroad, but any examination which may be conducted by such officiers abroad shall not be in substitution for examination at the United States port."

The general purpose of the bill is to admit actual Armenian refugees to the number who may want to come, without regard to the quota limitation. Only refugees who have blood relatives in the United States will be admissible and then on guarantees furnished by those relatives who must be American citizens or declarants.

AMERICAN SHIPS MAY CARRY GERMAN POTASH

DOLLAR LINE RUMORED TO BE PLANNING SERVICE ON ATLANTIC

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 13.—Plans have been under way, according to advice received from New York, but not authenticated here, to have the Robert Dollar Company of San Francisco provide bottoms to carry Germany's potash supply across the Atlantic. Rumor to this effect is current in New York shipping circles.

Dollar declared today that although he had looked into the possibility of the plans, he held no hopes of getting the contract. He said that any report of the fact was premature.

"I can't say anything about the future because I'm not active in trying to get the extensive trade at present," he said. "Commerce on the Pacific right now is taking up all my time."

The potash trade is said to be the outgrowth of the Potash Importing Corporation of America, a New York firm, having taken over the German potash syndicate, with the intention of starting operations May 1.

SHORTRIDGE WANTS TO HELP FARMERS

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Senator Shortridge announced today that every effort would be made to retain the Senate amendments to the House Agriculture Department appropriation bill. The bill has been sent to conference. It contains an item for $150,000 to be used in California in the elimination of predatory animals and $700,000 for the market news service of the department which California farmers have demanded.

POSTMASTERS CONFIRMED

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Several California postmasters were confirmed in the Senate today. These appointments include Fred W. McCollah of Long Beach, succeeding C. H. Windham, resigned; Sherman G. Batcheler, successor to Ernest Martin, commission expired as postmaster at San Bernardino and Henry Metzler at Fowler and Warren N. Garland at Oakland.

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

PORTERVILLE, Jan. 13.—Frank Rodergio was certified to the juvenile court by Judge Lumley in the justice court of Porterville this afternoon and taken to Visalia to be turned over to the juvenile officers as a result of running down Howard Keller, 12 years of age, in an automobile last night. Frank Silvas, riding with Rodergio at the time, was reprimanded by the judge. Both lads are about 17 years of age. Keller was injured severely.

National Idiosycrasies

It appears to be a rule in China that the richer a man is the more he separates himself from his womankind. A prosperous merchant never eats at the table with his wife and daughters; his and his son's food must be prepared separately and served in another room.

In Dutch Guiana the women carry upon their person all the family savings in the shape of heavy bracelets, anklets, necklaces and even crowns of gold and silver. They wear weighty ear-rings, and huge rings, six or eight inches in diameter, dangle from their noses.

Widows seldom marry again in China, and widowhood is esteemed as a condition of the highest respectability. When a widow attains her fiftieth year the government supplies her with a tablet on which her virtues are emblazoned. This is displayed over the door of her house.—[Exchange.

Maine's Bird Sanctuary

If they did not know it there is a sanctuary in Maine where deer are perpetually safe, where it is always closed time and has been for several years, by a bill put through by the Maine Legislature at the request of a lover of animals. Strangely enough, this sanctuary is Deer Isle, Hancock county, on Penobscot Bay. It is said to have derived its name from the number of deer seen upon it at one time just as its neighbors, the Fox Islands got their name from the silver-gray fox which years ago overran it. On both islands there is but little game these days, for once it is killed off more can get there only by crossing on the ice from the mainland during a severe winter or swimming across in summer. A few years ago several deer were seen on Deer Isle and during the last summer one or more were reported.—[Portland Press Herald.

FIFTY FEET FROM SUCCESS

When the Farmers' Bank of Canada failed there was a scandal. One man was sent to prison and others were disgraced because the funds of depositors had been used in the Keeley silver mine project, in which various of the officials were interested.

After the fall of the bank an English concern took over the Keeley mine. Fifty feet beyond that reached by the drills of the banking syndicate the English concern struck a vein of silver which is said to yield 2000 ounces to the ton.

Those Farmers' Bank men now can understand what was meant by being in the right church, but the wrong pew.—[Forbes Magazine.

STUCK UP FOR HIM

Private Brown and Private Smith were discussing the manners of their corporal, and from high words they got to blows. Both were engaged in a hot fight when the corporal appeared on the scene.

"What's the meaning of this?" he said.

"Oh," said Private Smith, "I was only sticking up for you."

"Sticking up for me? What do you mean?" asked the corporal.

"Well, Brown said you were not fit to live with a pig."

"Oh, did he?" said the corporal. "And what did you say?"

"I said you were."—[Exchange.

FOOLING ST. PETER

A little girl, woefully sad because her pet canary had died, put the remains in a cigar box and was digging a grave when her father came up.

"Father," she said, "will my little birdie go to heaven?"

"I think so," he replied. "In fact, I know so."

Whereupon the child, forgetting her grief, gave a loud laugh and clapped her hands.

"Oh," she cried, "how cross St. Peter will be when he opens it and finds it isn't cigars after all! — [Everybody's Magazine for January.

Mose Lightfoot, one of the best hod carriers on the job, lost his footing and fell to the street, four stories below.

When the foreman went to the basement, expecting to find Mose cold and stiff, he met Mose coming up the steps.

"Great Scott, man, aren't you killed?" he cride.

"No," Mose replied, dusting off his clothes. "I guess dat concrete pavement musta broke mah fall!"—[Youngstown Telegram.

RUHR INVASION HIT BY SPEAKER

Dr. Jordan Tells City Club France Sought Excuse

Discusses Recent Visit to Japanese Shores

Speaker Says Militarism is Dead in Nippon

"France wants the Ruhr Valley coal to operate her Lorraine iron mines, and a 'reparations' excuse is as good as any other for it," yesterday said Dr. David Starr Jordan, Chancellor Emeritus of Stanford University.

"Europe is in an awful tangle, and I am not prophesying as to the outcome," said Dr. Jordan. "I am reminded of Voltaire's advice: 'Never try to foretell the future, for there isn't any future.' However, it behooves America to keep free from the European entanglement unless America knows exactly what she is doing and where she is going.

Dr. Jordan, who, on his recent trip to Japan, was made a Knight of the Rising Sun, in recognition of his scholarly attainments, spoke to members of the City Club yesterday on "Japan's New Policy."

"The new policy of the government and the people of Japan is decidedly anti-imperialistic and anti-military," said the speaker, who cited the withdrawal of armies from Siberia and Shantung. The Women's Peace Society, he said, has succeeded in eliminating from the text-books all references to militarism.

WAR POLICY DEAD.

"The children of Japan, from now on, will not be taught to look up to military heroes, but will know the great men of history as those who have persisted in a good cause, desiring the freedom and education of the people," said Dr. Jordan.

"One of the main reasons for the present policy of Japan in regard to militarism lies in the gigantic expense of the imperialistic policy," said Dr. Jordan. 'If we had the money we threw away in Siberia, we could make Tokio a model modern city,' said the Mayor of that city to me not long ago."

Dr. Jordan said that the intellectuals of Japan have always been against war and that they represent the most important link between Japan and America, interpreting the two countries to each other.

No country has been so much lied about as Japan, according to Dr. Jordan, who paid special tribute to the honesty of the Japanese. In all the 1216 banks in Japan there are only two Chinese employees, he said, "in spite of the story to the effect that the Japanese are so dishonest that they have to have Chinese tellers in their banks."

FRIENDLY TO AMERICA

"The Japanese people do not fear the United States, especially since the Washington Conference," said Dr. Jordan. "They have never wanted misunderstanding with us—and they would not accept the Philippines as a present, for they wouldn't know what to do with the islands. Generally, the Japanese believe in spending their money at home. They are sick of the very idea of a vigorous foreign policy."

Speaking of the so-called yellow peril, Dr. Jordan said there is no such thing—and that the idea was only "a phobia of ex-Kaiser William." Sun Yat Sen, said the speaker, is a fantastic dreamer, but he said that Chinese affairs will be settled right, in good time—if outsiders will give China a chance.

While in Los Angeles, Dr. Jordan will be a guest at the home of Mrs. W. B. Scott, 315 La Fayette Park.

The speaker at the City Club next Wednesday at noon will be Mayor Cryer, who will give an address on "A New City Charter."

GUEST OF HONOR

At the invitation of Dr. Frank Dyer, pastor of the Wilshire-Boulevard Congregational Church, Dr. Jordan will speak at 11 a.m. today at the headquarters of that church in the Ambassador Hotel Theater. Tomorrow morning he will speak before Congregational ministers at 841 South Hope street. The public is invited.

Tomorrow evening Dr. Jordan will be guest of honor at a banquet at the Ambassador Hotel, and among those present will be Frederick Warde and James A. Blaisdell, president of Pomona College. The occasion for the banquet is the birthday celebration of the Wilshire-Boulevard Congregational Church and more than 400 guests, members of the church, will be present.

WATCHMAN BEATS OFF BANDIT DUO

Hawaiian Treasury Entered, but Robbers Are Routed With No Loot

[BY CABLE—EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

HONOLULU, Jan. 13.—Two hooded and masked bandits who attempted early this morning to break into the territorial treasury, the repository of $7,000,000 in negotiable securities and $750,000 cash, were beaten off by George Peka, 60-year-old Hawaiian watchman.

Peka attacked the first bandit, who fled, leaving his mask in the watchman's hands, and dropping an automatic pistol as he ran. The second man attacked the aged treasury guard with an unmounted umbrella handle, but Peka was too much for him, and he too decamped at high speed. The pair made their getaway in an automobile without obtaining any loot.

The bandit car was found later several miles away, with the hoods, gowns, umbrella handle and two acetylene tanks stolen from the Island Welding Company.

The unusually large amount of funds on hand in the treasury had been deposited there recently in returns from several banks under a tax ruling just handed down by the courts.

ARREST MARS HONEYMOON

Walter Emerson, Dancer, Accused by 16-Year-Old Girl, Former Partner, Detained at Bay City

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH]

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 13.—Miss Suzette Marie Tobey, 16-year-old professional dancer, brought the honeymoon of Walter Emerson, 26, her former dancing partner to an abrupt interruption yesterday, when she haled him before Dist.-Atty. Matthew Brady, and demanded a warrant upon a statutory charge.

When he appeared at the Hall of Justice, Emerson was accompanied by his bride, formerly Miss Jane Scholtz of Los Angeles. He denied the accusations, denouncing them as an attempt by Miss Tobey and her mother, Mrs. Charles Storey of Los Angeles, to embarrass, harass and ruin him.

WARRANT IS DELAYED

After hearing the girl's story and the defense of Emerson, the District Attorney announced that the warrant would be issued Monday. But he consented to allow the Emersons to remain at the St. Francis Hotel, under surveillance of a police officer until Monday morning.

During the examination it was disclosed that Miss Tobey had also instituted a breach of promise action for $50,000 against Emerson in Los Angeles courts. He is being defended in that suit by Attorney Milton Cohen, formerly of counsel for Roscoe Arbuckle. Mr. Cohen yesterday engaged Attorney Charles Brennan to appear with Emerson before the District Attorney.

ATTORNEY'S OPINION

"It is the old, old story, another case of a woman scorned," declared Emerson's attorney, after the conference.

Miss Tobey, who is well known to the amusement-following public in San Francisco, related her story in extensive detail, and her mother supplied corroboration.

The dancer, who is very pretty, and much larger than the average girl of sixteen, has been dancing in public for three years.

She asserts that Emerson was attracted by her ability two years ago and urged her mother to permit her to accompany him as a dancing partner. They appeared in Southern California and then on the T. and D. circuit in Seattle and other cities before coming to San Francisco for an engagement at Marquard's.

Subsequent engagements took them to Tait's and to the Granada Theater, and more recently the girl appeared as soloist with the Gorham follies at the Palace Hotel.

STORY OF ASSERTED ATTACK

The asserted attack, for which a warrant is petitioned, is declared by the girl to have taken place in the apartment of a friend of Emerson's at 846 Bush street, early in January, 1922. Since that date the intimacy was continued the girl admits, because of protestations of love by Emerson and his repeated promises of marriage.

But she avers, on last Christmas Day, out of a clear sky to her, came the announcement that Emerson had been married in Los Angeles to Miss Scholtz. The dancing girl says that she previously had confided to Emerson that she was about to become a mother and had urged that their wedding be no longer delayed. When news of his marriage came to her she sought her mother and told her story, after the family physician had confirmed her belief in approaching maternity.

Emerson insists that he was the victim of an infatuated girl and stoutly denies the charges in toto, declaring that he had not been guilty of betrayal of his pretty, youthful dancing partner. He insists that it had been a case for months of a girl and her mother trying to force him to marry against his wishes.

Recently Emerson began an acting engagement at the Fox Film Corporation at Hollywood, and announced upon his arrival at the St. Francis with his bride that they would return to Hollywood on Monday. He said he had formerly played juvenile parts here in the Alcazar Theater.

INVASION VIEWED AS ERROR

Ruhr Occupancy Success Shrouded in Doubt in Minds of Frenchmen in Berlin

BY S. B. CONGER

[BY CABLE—EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

[Copyright, 1923, Public Ledger.]

BERLIN, Jan. 13.—Even Frenchmen in Berlin have begun to share the opinion of the diplomatic corps and observers that France committed a big tactical mistake in invading the Ruhr. Your correspondent heard today from several French sources in touch with French diplomacy that consular opinion regrets that Premier Poincare put his mailed fist policy into effect instead of accepting the opportunity offered him of negotiating directly with the German government and big business, holding the Ruhr occupation in reserve as a means of pressure.

"Now that occupation actually is in effect," said a well-informed foreign diplomat, "it is rather like an empty pistol as far as persuasive value is concerned."

The doubts of these Frenchmen are augmented by news of the embarrassments already encountered in executing the Ruhr plans. Local authorities have declined to execute orders or to take charge of coal production, resting on the legal fact that they have no authority over the coal syndicate, mine owners and railroads, which are dependent on Berlin.

OWNERS IGNORE MEET

The leading industrialists and mine owners like Stinnes, Krupp, Thyssen and Kirdorf, failed to obey their invitations to attend a meeting and receive the French instructions regarding the management of mines and plants and the French orders must be transmitted to individual enterprises instead of dealing with the Ruhr coal industry as an organized group.

The government's decision to refuse to pay German mine owners for reparations coal delivered or requisitioned by France or Belgium, will leave the owners without funds to meet their pay rolls within a fortnight unless the French and Belgians supply the funds, while the industries in unoccupied Germany are arranging to supply their fuel needs from England, which stands to reap considerable profit from the French adventure. Germans bought several million tons of coal in England last year and the price is not prohibitively high compared to the domestic price, including the 40 per cent coal tax.

SUCCESS DOUBTED

Whether the Ambassador is behind the expressions of doubt circulating in French circles is uncertain, but he has heard very unflattering remarks about the wisdom of the French plan and the chances of its success from all sides in diplomatic circles.

An open opinion frequently heard here is that the French scheme is comprehensible if it is based on the hope of breaking up Germany, detaching the Rhineland and bringing the Ruhr under the influence of the big French industries so as to permit them to work Lorraine iron and Ruhr coal and establish economic mastery in Continental Europe, but that as a method of bringing Germany to the council table in a proper frame of mind and obtaining reparations it is the greatest and gravest mistake.

It is learned in the same circles that before the American decision to recall the troops attempts were made for two days to sound the Foreign Office to learn whether the withdrawal was desired by Germany. The efforts only elicited the diplomatic straddle that the government would welcome the withdrawal as a protest against the French action, but was unwilling to see American troops replaced by French. Before a straight, clear answer was received from Chancellor Cuno that a withdrawal would be unwelcome the orders for recall already had been issued.

Highway Bosses Arrive Here on Inspection Tour

Harvey M. Toy, new chairman of the State Highway Commission just appointed by Gov. Richardson, and Louis Everding of Eureka, a member of the commission, arrived in the city yesterday on their first tour of inspection of State highways. They are at the Rosslyn Hotel. They expect to spend several days in going over the highways in this district.

Neither commissioner was prepared last night to make any statement regarding the problems of policy of the department, preferring to wait until they had become more familiar with its needs.

UNEMPLOYED EAT, THEN DISAPPEAR

TELL RESTAURANT OWNERS IN VANCOUVER TO "CHARGE IT" TO CITY'S ACOUNT

[BY A. P. NIGHT WIRE.]

VANCOUVER, (B. C.), Jan. 13. Small groups of unemployed men who yesterday were denied the hospitality of the City Jail by Chief of Police Anderson, last night were uninvited guests of several restaurants where they quietly told the cashiers to "charge it, and collect it at the City Hall in the morning." Free beds also were demanded at a number of downtown hotels.

Police investigated complaints of restaurant proprietors, but the men had disappeared before the arrival of the officers. One group which dined at the expense of a large cafe numbered seventeen.

PRAYS FOR WIFE AND GETS ONE

Evangelist Says He Turned Down Wealthy Candidates for "Right Woman"

[BY A. P. NIGHT WIRE.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 13.—Rev. George Herman Lawson, Orange, (N. J.) clergyman who announced recently that he had prayed fervently for a bride to relieve the loneliness that had come to him with the death of his wife in 1910, was married today at the Manhattan marriage license bureau. The bride was Mrs. Ella Wieber, a window, also of Orange. Mrs. Wieber had attended several of Rev. Mr. Lawson's evangelistic meetings.

Prior to their departure for Philadelphia, where the couple will spend their honeymoon in a series of revivals, Mr. Lawson declared he had selected his bride in preference to any one of a number of wealthy women who were "on his trail."

"She is the simon-pure article," he said of Mrs. Lawson. "She was in the background when the others were doing the talking. The Almighty has been good—this is a real answer to my prayers. Two or three other camouflaged articles came, prompted by the devil, but God, in the end, sent the right one. I turned down all of those millionaires on my trail for a good honest woman."

HOLLYWOOD HILLS

This tract is located on the north side of Los Feliz Boulevard, between Vermont avenue and Western avenue, on a gentle sloping mesa, reaching from the boulevard north two thousand feet to Griffith Park.

It is the choicest part of the Hollywood foothill section and every improvement that money can buy is being installed.

It is approached by wide streets, on easy grades, paved and well lighted. Water, gas and sewer are all connected with each lot, making it unnecessary to cut the pavement for any purpose and saving the owner the cost of street connections for all public utilities.

All electric light and telephone wires are placed underground and connected with each lot, entirely eliminating all the poles from the tract.

The parkings are being planted to trees and flowers, and automatic sprinklers are being installed.

It is restricted for fifty years to single, private residences and with adjoining tracts with similar restrictions, covers a larger area than any other tract in Los Angeles.

Many beautiful residence districts have been spoiled by the erection of flats and duplex houses, across the street or in the immediate vicinity.

This cannot happen to Hollywood Hills. It is surrounded by restricted property, with Griffith Park adjoining it on the north.

The average size of lots is 13,000 square feet.

It cannot be crowded or closely built up.

The climatic conditions are the best in Los Angeles, owing to the elevation, the cool air settles on the lower ground giving a temperature in winter several degrees warmer than in the flat districts to the south, while in summer there is an unobstructed breeze over the tops of buildings and trees in the valley below, making the warm days much more pleasant. This difference will increase as the open spaces in the flat ground are built up and planted.

This elevated ground, overlooking Hollywood, can never have its view shut off or its ocean breezes obstructed by development below it. It is limited in extent and no more hills are being created.

If you are not ready to build now, select your lot, pay a small amount down, plant it and let your trees and shrubbery be growing while you are getting ready to build.

The terms are one-fifth down and balance in four equal payments, due in one, two, three and four years. 2 per cent discount for cash.

WM. MEAD, owner, 5125 Los Feliz Blvd. Tel. 597453.

DELAYS COST PUBLIC VAST SUM ANNUALLY

Three Quarters of Million Wasted Yearly Owing to Shortage of Help in Building Department

Delays in the issuance of building permits and in the inspection of buildings in process of construction, owing to the inadequate force of employees in the building department of the city, are costing the public of Los Angeles $750,000 per year, according to C. V. Welch, Assistant Chief Inspector of Buildings.

At the present time there are plans to the value of $10,000,000 filed with the building department, and the checking force is three weeks behind in its work. If building activity continues to increase in its present ratio, the department will be a month to five weeks behind, Mr. Welch stated, and it will be practically impossible to issue permits within a reasonable length of time. Just prior to the Christmas holidays, Mr. Welch said, the department was about fourteen days behind, but applications have increased so rapidly within the last three weeks that about three weeks is now required for the issuance of a permit.

This situation is ascribed by Mr. Welch not only to the fact that the number of employees allowed to the department, which has become one of the busiest in the city administration, is limited, but also to the fact that the salaries paid are so low that it is practically impossible to get efficient and experienced employees. In the checking department the department is allowed eleven men, but at the present time there are only seven at work. While there are plenty of applications, the pay is deemed so low that the positions cannot be filled. The department has advertised for more men for this department, Mr. Welch said, and it has also appealed to the Civil Service Commission, but without result.

Early in December a communication, giving a detailed account of the conditions now prevalent in the department, were filed with the City Council and it is hoped that the Council will take action to relieve the situation. This communication requested a higher scale of salaries, additions to the plumbing and building inspection departments, and additional clerks.

PAY HIGHER SALARIES

A new schedule of salaries prepared by Mr. Welch, and presented to the City Council calls for an additional expenditure of about $50,000 per year for the department, but during the first six months, under the new schedule, no additional appropriation would be necessary, since nearly half of this sum has accumulated to the department's salary account, owing to the fact that for some time the department has been running short-handed.

During 1922, according to the report made by the department to the Board of Public Works, the department of buildings showed a net profit of more than $138,000, and even with the additional expenditure of $50,000 for salaries, a wide margin of profit will be left.

FACT AND COMMENT

Convenience of the public is not necessarily the first consideration of the City Councilman, but at least the subject is worthy of some consideration, and with Los Angeles facing a year of building activity that promises to exceed even that of 1922, some serious thought might profitably be given to the needs of the building department in the way of additional men and equipment, with emphasis on the matter of more men to check the plans which are submitted to the building department for approval before the prospective builder can proceed with actual construction work.

The congestion in the building department is really serious. Literally hundreds of plans for all types of structures are now in the racks, waiting the attention of the checking department, and some of these plans will wait there for weeks before any action is taken.

This is no fault of the department, which is doing its utmost to keep pace with building activity, but the department is badly in need of more men in order that the execution of the work may be facilitated. At the present time there are plans to the value of more than $10,000,000 in the hands of the department for checking, and the man who files plans today must resign himself to a wait of three weeks to a month before he can start work with proper authorization.

This creates not only an irritating situation, but it also, in many cases, is an expensive one for the prospective builder, to whom every delay means money lost.

Last year officials of the build-

BIG TOTAL IN SALES

Property to Value of Nearly Million Dollars Transferred Through Local Realty Firm

Property sales in the downtown district aggregating more than $800,000 in valuation were reported yesterday by the Charles G. Andrews Company, agents in the transactions. Among the most important of these sales was the transfer of sixty feet of frontage on the west side of Hill street, adjoining the Junior Orpheum Building to a Detroit investor for a cash consideration of $240,000. The property was bought from the Title Insurance and Trust Company, which was represented by W. W. Mines in the deal. The property, now improved with a one-story building, was bought for investment, and no further improvements will be made, according to the agents.

The Pacific Southwest Trust and Savings Bank, acting as trustee, sold to Isaacs Brothers Company, Inc., the northwest corner of Seventh and Witmer streets for $150,000, the deal involving all cash. The property is 112x120 feet. The easterly half is now improved with a one-story brick building occupied by the Johns-Manville Company, but the new owners plan to improve the inside fifty feet with a new building to correspond with that now on the property.

The Consolidated Realty Company has sold the lot on the west side of Flower street, between Eighth and Ninth, to Fred W. Siegel for $62,500, and at this location Mr. Siegel will erect a modern height-limit hotel building. The property has a frontage of fifty feet on Flower street, with a depth of 155 feet.

School Leases Floor of Sun Drug Building

The Murray-Gerber Company, realtors, announce through J. A. Hutchings of its sales and leasing department the closing of a ten-year lease on the entire twelfth floor, 66x18 feet, of the new Sun Drug Building at Seventh and Hill streets, to the Los Angeles Business College for the Sun Realty Company.

The Los Angeles Business College, the oldest in Los Angeles, was established in the year of 1882. For the last two years it has been located in the Union League Building at Second and Hill streets, and for twelve years previous to that at Eighth and Hill streets. In 1912 it absorbed the Healds Business College.

Enrollment of classes now, both in the day and night school, is under way. The enrollment in the night school greatly exceeds all expectations.

Record Price Reported for Wilshire Tract

E. Avery McCarthy of the McCarthy Company has bought a small tract north of Beverly Boulevard, between Van Ness and Norton avenues, at what is said to be the highest price per acre for any acreage in the North Wilshire district. The consideration was $13,250 per acre.

The property has been held by the eastern owner, residing in New York, who recently came to Los Angeles for the purpose of making the sale in order to close an estate, and Mr. McCarthy was the highest bidder for the property.

Definite plans as to the disposition to be made of the property have not been made by Mr. McCarthy, who may retain the entire tract and improve it with modern multiple dwellings. Part of the property may be sold, however, Mr. McCarthy said, and the remainder improved. The ground is located at an elevation of ninety-six feet above neighboring streets.

PICO, WESTERN CORNER SOLD

The property located on the southeast corner of Pico street and Western avenue has been sold by Mrs. Lillian McLaughlin to S. D. Tuttle, former resident of Phoenix, for a consideration of approximately $100,000. The property has a frontage of 98 feet on Pico street and 127 feet on Western avenue.

An apartment-house stands on the east part of the lot and a number of store and office buildings are located on the Western avenue side of the property.

The transaction was handled by L. E. Grimm of the firm of Grimm & Noland, local real estate brokers. brokers.

AT LEAST ONE RIVAL FOR CITY

A. C. Blumenthal's prediction that Los Angeles is destined to be the third largest city in the land seems to be debateable in face of the following quotation from Jarvis Hunt, a Chicago architect, which appeared in a mid western publication recently:

It doesn't take a prophet to see what Kansas City is going to be. Kansas City is going to be the third largest city in America. Anybody can see that. The reason is that Kansas City is the gateway to the West; to an empire that has hardly begun to develop. Buy real estate in Kansas City and it will make you rich. You can't go wrong.

NEW PRESIDENT ACTIVE WORKER

Edwin G. Hart Joined Board Soon After Formation

Educated in Public Schools of Pasadena

Has Developed Large Areas of Back Country

Edwin G. Hart

Edwin G. Hart, the newly-elected president of the Los Angeles Realty Board, has been a real estate operator in Southern California for twenty years and he has lived in this State for almost forty years. He joined the board two years after it was organized and has been an active worker in the organization in its efforts to serve the community and raise the standards of the profession.

"We were always glad when 'Ed' Hart would serve on a committee," said Herbert Burdett, the first secretary of the Los Angeles Realty Board, the other day, "for we knew he would work. He never was much on publicity, though. He was always content for someone else to have that." Mr. Burdett was secretary of the board from its organization May 29, 1903 until 1910.

Mr. Hart was born in Cleveland, O., and when ten years old his family came to California in 1886, settling in Sierra Madre. Until 1900 the Hart family lived in the foothills and Edwin attended Pasadena High School and later Throop Institute, now the California Institute of Technology.

In school young Hart was a leader in athletics, especially football and his love for the game has never ceased and he follows the fortunes of the college and high school gridiron teams of the present day with unflagging interest.

It is a coincidence that the new president of the realtors is like the retiring president, Frank Ryan, in that both are expert boxers. Early in life each learned to use the gloves and both attained more than the usual skill in the art of self defense.

Shortly after leaving school Mr. Hart entered a most exciting period of his life. He went into the State of Oaxaca in Southern Mexico where he had charge of 600 Mexican miners, the nearest white man being many miles away. In the five years he spent in that country he had many experiences. He was in Mexico City at the time Madero effected its capture.

In his career as a real estate operator Mr. Hart has specialized in the selecting of raw land and converting it into valuable units of agricultural productivity. He has trained himself as an analyst of the possibilities of given tracts of land and he has made a reputation for the kenness of his judgment. He took one area of 2000 acres and by means of wells, pressure equipment and the utilization of gravity converted its value to $3500 an acre. Another larger tract of 3500 acres caused him to have $250,000 spent in improvements and a sheep ranch became in the process a center of intensive agricultural development which brought the value per acre into the four-figure classification. His associates state that Mr. Hart had always had high ideals in his business, always being firm in the belief that a real estate operator should accomplish work of constructive nature.

Mr. Hart was one of the early members of both the Los Angeles Athletic Club and the California Club. He also belongs to the San Gabriel Country Club and the Hacienda Country Club. He has a wife and four children—three boys and a girl, the oldest boy being now a student in the Pasadena High School which his father attended.

DELAYS CAUSE GREAT WASTE

It is estimated that the net profit for the present year will be in excess of $150,000, at the present rate of building activity.

NEW SCHEDULE

In the report to the City Council it is requested that the salary of the chief inspector of buildings be raised to $6000 per year, and that the following scale of salaries be adopted, salaries to be increased each year during the first three years:

No.	Title.	—Per month— 1st yr.	2nd yr.	3rd yr.
1	—Assistant chief inspector....	$325	$335	$350
1	—Chief structural engineer...	300	310	325
1	—Chief clerk	215	225	240
1	—Structural engineer	275	285	[illegible]
2	—Structural engineers	245	260	275
4	—Structural engineers	225	245	[illegible]
2	—Asst. structural engineers..	210	215	225
5	—Asst. structural engineers..	185	195	210
1	—Senior building inspector..	215	225	240
1	—Asst. building inspector...	200	205	215
33	—Asst. building inspectors..	175	185	200
1	—Senior plumbing inspector..	215	225	240
1	—Asst. plumbing inspector...	200	205	215
[illegible]	—Asst. plumbing inspectors..	175	185	200
1	—Clerk	190	200	215
1	—Clerk	150	155	165
1	—Architectural draughtsman..	185	195	210
1	—Stenographer	110	115	125

Both the structural and the assistant structural engineers will have full charge of the checking department, where all plans are checked over to make certain that they conform with the building laws of the city. Plans for large projects would be checked by these department heads, while the smaller plans would all be checked by the thirty-eight assistants provided for in this plan.

Under this arrangement, Mr. Welch believes, efficient employees could be obtained, and plans submitted to the department for approval could be handled promptly and efficiently, with a minimum of delay.

Great difficulty, Mr. Welch pointed out, has been experienced in keeping the trained staff intact, since many of the employees have received offers, carrying larger pay, from commercial firms. During the past year the department lot fifteen men, who accepted other positions. Among those who resigned were engineers, building and plumbing inspectors, and a number of the clerical employees.

Attempts to replace these employees, Mr. Welch said, have in most cases been unavailing; a large number of applications for employment have been received, but most of the applicants wanted larger salaries than the department can pay. One position, that of draughsman, for which the department pays $135 per month, has been vacant for months, owing to the fact that good draughtsmen are receiving from $50 to $75 per week in commercial work.

The figure of $750,000 annual loss to the building public of the city is conservative, Mr. Welch says. Delayed inspections are the greatest source of direct expense to the builder, since he unwittingly carries out plans that are not allowed under the building laws, and to require change after the building has progressed to an advanced point means considerable extra expense, in many cases, to the owner.

Promoters of some of the larger building projects have offered to pay the costs of overtime work of the building department employees in order to facilitate issuance of the permit, but it has been deemed inadvisable to permit this practice, and they have had to wait their turn. Payment by the city for overtime work would not assist the situation materially, Mr. Welch said, since overtime work would in all probability reduce the efficiency of the department's employees during the regular working day.

Mr. Welch believes that if a higher salary scale is adopted, sufficient employees can be obtained to carry on the work, and that even with the higher salary level, the department will be able to show a profit to the city of about $100,000.

FINE LIBRARIES TO BE ERECTED

buff stucco finish, with artificial stone used for ornamentation, and the roof will be of variegated tile. The main entrance will be on Hollywood Boulevard, and will lead directly into the main reading room.

At the end of the west wing will be an arbor, facing an inclosed garden, access to which will be had from the main reading room and the children's room. At the corner a tower will contain the stairway to the second floor. Dodd & Richards are the architects.

The Figueroa-street library, to be erected at the northwest corner of Eightieth and Figueroa streets at a cost of about $7500, will be of English-cottage design, with stucco exterior and irregularly laid shingles. The windows will be divided into small panes, and the main-entrance archway will be built of tooled tufa stone, flanked with wrought-iron lamps. C. E. Noerenberg is the architect.

In addition to these, plans for four substations and one warehouse, with an estimated total valuation of more than $650,000, were submitted and approved, as also were plans for five sheds to be built at a cost of $367,000 at Los Angeles Harbor.

The report of the commission also urged that signs be eliminated from marquises over public sidewalks, since the practice is becoming more and more prevalent of using these marquises for advertising purposes. Plans for 300 lighting standards to be placed on Hollywood and Sunset boulevards at a cost of $200,000 also were approved, as also were plans for four power buildings, six street clocks, the clubhouse of the California Yacht Club and the concrete wall and balustrade for the Second-street tunnel.

Expenditures of the commission for the year, according to the report, which was made by F. W. Blanchard, president, and J. J. Backus, secretary of the commission, totaled approximately $225.

BIG TOTAL IN REALTY SALES of the Rosslyn Hotel, has purchased fifty feet of frontage on the west side of Flower street, between Fifth and Sixth streets, adjoining the corner which he now owns, for $65,000 cash. With this purchase Mr. Hart now owns 180 feet of frontage on Flower street and 115 on Sixth. The corner is now occupied by a one-story building, and a one-story building adjoining this structure on the west was recently completed by Mr. Hart. The property just acquired will probably be improved in the near future with a structure to correspond with the present buildings.

The southwest corner of Seventh and Carondelet streets, 100 by 140 feet, was sold through the Andrews Company to a local investor by W. A. Morehouse for $70,000 cash, and the sale of fifty feet of frontage on the east side of Figueroa street, between Tenth and Eleventh streets by C. J. Fox, Jr., to a local investor for $60,000 is also reported.

Other sales include the purchase by a local syndicate of the northwest corner of Washington and Oak streets, 105 by 175. The property is now improved with temporary buildings. J. D. Kelly sold to a local investor a lot on West Adams street for $18,500.

Evidencing the ever increasing interest in West Sixth street property is the sale reported by which Jacob Steinberg conveys to Messrs. Beller and Bloom, wholesale electrical supply dealers of Newark, N. J., the southwest corner of Sixth and Witmer streets, 99.7 by 152. The property is vacant. The purchasers acquired the lot for permanent investment and expect to improve it within ninety days with a one-story brick store building comprising five stores facing Sixth street, with a garage on Witmer street. The consideration was $48,000. Both parties were represented by Bernard Rosenthal and D. Parker Bryon of the Charles G. Andrews Company.

Messrs. Beller and Bloom have purchased through Charles G. Andrews Company, represented by Bernard Rosenthal, the property bounded by Crownhill, Witmer and Columbia streets, comprising six lots, 240 feet on Crownhill by 165 feet on the side streets. The seller was Mrs. Alice P. Witmer, and the consideration $40,000.

COLUMN FOR URNS PUT IN MAUSOLEUM

A column of niches for the reception of urns has just been installed in Hollywood Mausoleum in Hollywood Cemetery for the use of those who favor cremation, according to Frank G. Hogan, president of the California Mausoleum Company. Many of the urns, it is stated, have been designed by Mr. Hogan himself. These are made of bronze and are engraved with the names of their owners.

The company is now completing the second unit of its Inglewood Mausoleum in Inglewood Cemetery, containing 1198 crypts built of reinforced concrete, granite and marble. It is expected that this structure will be ready early in the spring. When finished it will have a capacity of 2520 crypts.

GREATEST YEAR OF ALL

Past Year's Unsurpassed Building Record Shows Magnitude of City's Varied Expansion

Again Los Angeles went over the top for a new building record. The annual report of the building department has just been prepared and again it stands as evidence of the tremendous strides that are being made by the metropolis of the Pacific Coast. During the past year 47,397 building permits were issued by the Los Angeles Building Department. This is a gain of 10,191 permits and $38,445,401 over the total for 1921. The increase is 27.4 per cent in the number of permits and 46.4 per cent in valuation, according to figure contained in the annual report of J. J. Backus, chief inspector of buildings. The 1921 report of Mr. Backus indicated that the gain in permits for 1921 over 1920 was 45.6 per cent in number and 37.9 per cent in valuation.

In April the total valuation for permits issued during the month was $12,959,686. This was the greatest valuation for any one month during the year. The greatest number of permits issued in a month were granted in October when 4951 permits were granted.

ONE UNIQUE FEATURE

The feature of the building of 1922 in Los Angeles was the great increase in the number of business buildings that have been erected. During the past year the annual reports indicate that 1090 building permits have been issued for business structures. The total valuation was $16,271.575. This is a gain of 90.6 per cent over this type of building for 1921. During the earlier year 895 permits were issued, the valuation being $8,535,228. Of the business building erected in 1922, 882 were mercantile buildings with a valuation of $10,307,907; 62 for office structures, with a total valuation of $4,315,566 and 146 for public garages at a cost of $1,648,102.

Of the total number of permits issued during 1922, 40.1 per cent were for dwellings flats and apartment-houses. The valuation of these structures is 55.3 per cent of the total valuation for the year. The permits issued during 1921 for these types of structures made up 41.8 per cent of the total number and 57.3 per cent of the total valuation. This would indicate that the proportionate percentage of increase of housing was not so great during 1922, but considering the volume of building during the last year the number of new homes flats and apartments was much greater than that for the preceding year.

HOUSING INCREASED

Permits were issued for 18,197 single and double dwellings with an estimated valuation of $51 488,709. The same figures for 1921 are 14 954 and $38,905 214. These figures do not include dwelling structures which cost less than $500, for these are classified under sheds.

Permits for 554 two-story flat buildings were issued during 1922; this number represents a valuation of $6,296,820. In 1921 permits for 475 similar structures were issued, the valuation being $5,742.214.

Apartment-house construction showed a corresponding rate of increase during the last year. In all, permits for 300 apartments were issued; the cost of these structures was estimated to be $9 219 260. In addition to this number thirty permits were issued for hotels and lodging houses; the valuation was estimated to be $6 279,717. In 1921 permits for 127 apartments were issued the cost was stated to be $2,827,845.

In all of the new houses for which permits were provided during the year the report states that there is room for 28,033 families.

The total number of permits issued for factory buildings during 1922 was sixty-three, representing a valuation of $1,122,600. An additional 139 permits were issued for miscellaneous industrial buildings, the valuation being $1,848,711. Besides these 112 permits were issued for workshops representing a cost of $605,501. In 1921, the total number of factories was forty-two, the valuation was $598,115; the number of workshops was 119 with the valuation at $275,037. The total number for industrial buildings in 1921 was 855; in 1922, 484. The respective valuations were $4,539,692 and $6,479,549.

Fourteen motion-picture studio permits were issued during 1922; this is twelve less than the number issued in the preceding year. The valuation in 1922 was $233,400, the figure in 1921 being $371,726. A total of 156 permits were issued for new warehouses during 1922; these represent a valuation of $2,669,337. Ten permits were issued for wharves and represent a valuation of $924.640.

MANY MILES LONG

In making his report of the frontage of the new buildings for which permits were issued, Mr. Backus states in his report:

"An idea of the amount of buildings erected during the year may be conveyed by considering these buildings placed one against the other in a straight line, without making allowance for the different stories and heights of the buildings. The total frontage of all buildings and additions for the year amounts to 1,329 359 feet, or approximately 251.8 miles. This frontage is subdiveded into 901,320 feet for new buildings, 341,566 feet for sheds and 86,473 feet for new additions."

The total frontage of new buildings for which permits were issued in 1921 was 744,336, according to Mr. Backus's 1921 report. This is an equivalent of 141 miles. Of this total 485,352 were for new buildings, 185,184 for sheds and 73,800 for additions.

An increase of 1703 in the number of plans filed in the building department is set forth in the report. The total number of plans presented during 1922 was 7031.

During the past year the building department made a total of 388,357 inspections, according to the report. Of this number 226,750 were building inspections, and 161 607 were plumbing inspections.

During 1922 permits for five class A steel frame buildings were issued; forty-three for class A reinforced concrete buildings; six for class B brick buildings; 707 for class C brick or concrete buildings, and 34,140 permits for class D frame buildings.

The following is a list giving a classification of the new buildings for which permits were issued:

Ryan Appointed Head of Committee on Coming High Jinks at Del Monte

Frank Ryan, retiring president of the Los Angeles Realty Board, has been named by President E. G. Hart as chairman of a high-jinks committee, which shall have in charge the co-operation with members of the San Francisco Real Estate Board in accepting their invitation to Del Monte in May and in staging a fall event in Los Angeles at which the Bay City realtors will be guests.

Mr. Ryan originated the idea of the realty boards of the two cities combining in a united effort to bring the influential civic elements of San Francisco and Los Angeles into co-ordinated service to the State—a movement to subordinate petty jealousies and engage in teamwork for the benefit of all of California.

Because of the success of the intercity meetings held under the two administrations of Mr. Ryan, the incoming president and his associates on the governing committee at their last meeting decreed that the retiring executive should be the leading spirit in the two gatherings scheduled for 1923.

The Charles Weeks Poultry Colony
AT OWENSMOUTH, CALIFORNIA
Founded by CHARLES WEEKS

THIRTY THOUSAND head of young chickens have already been reared in this remarkable poultry colony.

The success of each individual settler has been phenomenal. Old poultrymen marvel at the results. Many thousand broilers are being marketed to make room for the finest lot of pullets ever grown.

All these have come from trapnested stock direct from the famous WEEKS POULTRY RANCH at Palo Alto, California, and have 18 years' select breeding behind them.

The WEEKS SYSTEM OF INTENSIVE EGG FARMING is recognized today as a superior method.

I believe my work of building co-operative, intensive, self-supporting Little Farms Communities is the greatest economical work of the age, bringing peace of mind, health of body and an abundant living to thousands bound in slavery by wage earning or too much business.

I have a far greater work than the mere subdivision of land.

I am building an ideal community made up of successful people who wish to live this natural healthy life close to Nature in a neighborhood of uniform, symmetrical, harmonious garden homes where the highest science of intensive production is common knowledge to all.

Each settler buys direct and pays cash for his land and gets a deed and certificate of title for same. This protects the buyer and ensures a thrifty community without shacks.

Visit me in our home on the Model Acre and I will show you how we keep 2500 hens on one acre and make them net not less than $2.00 each.

The greatest recommendation an enterprise can have is to be imitated. THEREFORE, see ME in person before locating.

I LECTURE PERSONALLY

every Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock at the SYMPHONY HALL, MUSIC-ART STUDIO, 232 S. Hill Street, Los Angeles, on the Fine Art of Earning a Comfortable Living on One Acre of Land in California. If you cannot come to the lecture, write for literature. Address Charles Weeks, Owensmouth, California.

Directions to Tract: Take Pacific Electric at 4th and Hill streets for Owensmouth, or drive from Hollywood through Cahuenga Pass to Van Nuys, thence 8 miles west on Sherman Way to the Charles Weeks Poultry Colony.

BANQUET EVENT OF THIS WEEK

Realtors Will Hold Annual Dinner Thursday

Interesting Program Prepared for Evening

Will Make Award of Board's Service Watch

With a speaker of national reputation, splendid entertainment features, the curiosity attendant upon the annual awarding of the "service watch" and all indications pointing to a record attendance, the fourth formal banquet of the Los Angeles Realty Board next Thursday evening at the Ambassador Hotel promises to eclipse all preceding functions held by the realtors of this city.

James Schermerhorn of Detroit, Mich., will give his famous talk, "The Soul of a City." He is a speaker known from coast to coast for his entertaining, worthwhile talks to business men, according to Secretary Tom Ingersoll of the local organization. Frank Ryan, retiring president of the board, will present his annual report, and Edwin G. Hart, the new head of the realtors, will be officially introduced to the membership. Clinton E. Miller, a past president of the board, will be toastmaster.

H. R. Kelis, chairman of the committee on entertainment, has arranged a program with orchestral and vocal music as the principal features. A secret committee composed of representatives from other civic organizations meeting with a committee from the Los Angeles Realty Board, will choose the man who is to receive the watch as recognition of a great service rendered during 1922 to the citizenship of Los Angeles. This announcement will be made at the banquet.

The reservations for the function opened last week and immediately the office of the board was deluged with orders for tickets, but Chairman Frank H. Brooks of the banquet committee, had anticipated the increased demand and yesterday he stated that, although the preliminary demand had been heavy, there were sufficient seats to take care of all late comers.

Tables have been arranged for six, eight, ten or twelve persons and many firms have reserved entire tables for representatives from their offices. Two of the large realty concerns in a certain section of Los Angeles have their tables side by side. Other companies are so grouped and it is expected that the arrangement will increase the spirit of friendliness and good fellowship, which has been generated at the regular luncheons of the organization.

A unique feature of the banquet will be the formation of many of the salesmen members of the board into squads of ushers who will see that the guests are seated at their proper tables promptly and in the right seats.

Secretary Tom Ingersoll sent a special bulletin to the membership on the banquet Thursday and as a result many additional reservations were made Friday and yesterday.

Builders' Questions Answered

BY E. EARL GLASS,
Manager Southern California Chapter Associated General Contractors of America

[With the view of rendering assistance to prospective builders and for the purpose of giving sound advice on problems arising in connection with building projects The Times has instituted this department, which will be conducted as a weekly feature. All questions should be sent to the Real Estate and Building Department, Los Angeles Times.]

Question: The man who contracted to erect my house left town with the work unfinished and all tied up so I cannot go ahead with it. The lumber company has put a bad check he gave them on my bill and is holding me for payment of extras that were never delivered to the job. They claim their deal is with the contractor and refuse to give me any satisfaction. Must I stand for such treatment? What can I do?

Answer: It is easier to tell you what you should have done than what you can do now. A careful investigation of the contractor before signing the contract would probably have revealed evidence of the trouble which actually developed. A bond accompanying the contract would have protected you in any case but a builder who cannot furnish a bond usually advises the owner against "wasting" his money on a bond. The fallacy of such economy is evident. Your case is a question of fact and law and should be passed on by an attorney. If you can prove your case as stated, you are evidently secure against any additional cost.

Q.: I believe I can put in the sewer connection to my new home for less than the sewer men bid for the job. Will I be allowed to do the work and how shall I proceed? How deep must the ditch be dug, and what size pipe? . . .

A.: As there seem to be several important things that you do not know about this kind of work, you may find that you are mistaken about the cost of a sewer connection. There is real competion between the sewer contractors and you can easily get a number of bids from experienced men wanting the work. You will be allowed to open the street to make the sewer connection by depositing $300 cash or $600 bond for proper execution of the work and making application for a permit at the office of the City Engineer. The trench must be five feet deep at the front property line and no grade less than one-fourth inch per foot is permitted. Use six-inch pipe in the street and four-inch beyond the lot line.

Q.: I have a hillside lot and the other owners are going to petition for street improvement. How can I tell what the cut will be at my lot when the street is graded and how can I learn the cost before the work is signed for?

A.: The answer is no in both cases. The City Engineer must have a profile of your street showing a proposed grade but it is improbable that the grade will be definitely established until the petition for improvement is presented. However, the street department of the City Engineer's office may be able to give you an approximate answer to both questions.

BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER EXPORTS BIG

JAPAN BUYS MORE CANADIAN PROVINCE OUTPUT THAN UNITED STATES DOES

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

VANCOUVER (B. C.) Jan. 13. British Columbia exported 260,500,000 feet of lumber in 1922. This exceeds the export of 1921 by nearly 100,000,000 feet and is the largest on record, according to figures compiled by the Department of Mines and Forests.

Japan was the largest buyer of British Columbia lumber, taking 60,000,000 feet. The United States was second, buying 49,000,000 feet. Other countries purchased in the following order: Australia, China, United Kingdom, India, Egypt, New Zealand, South Africa, South America and Cuba.

Lumbering operations all over the province have taken a new lease on life. The industry is in a more prosperous condition than it has been in years. Orders are pouring into the saw mills in the vast forest belt along the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. Increased demand is said by experts to be due to the building boom throughout the world.

Lumbermen on Vancouver Island are expanding their operations. One large manufacturer recently increased the production of his mill to 1,000,000 feet a day and is laying track for a railroad forty miles long near Chamainus to open up a stand of virgin timber said to be one of the finest on the island.

British Columbia's area of merchantable timber is said to be second in size only to the forests of Central Russia. With the Russian source cut off with the ascendancy of the soviets, this province is now the world's greatest source of timber supply.

development of the district Palmdale on any extensive has been retarded owing to of water, but it is believed this project will afford suffi- water to make this section of the most productive in California. The Palmdale territory has become recognized as a producing center for Bartlett pears, and recently a large precooling plant for preparation of the product for long shipments, was erected at Palmdale. During the past season ten carloads of Antelope Valley pears were shipped to London on refrigerated boats, running direct from Los Angeles Harbor to England through the Panama Canal.

The water supply which will be afforded by the new dam will serve to greatly increase the pear acreage in the valley, it is believed. Several months will be required to complete the construction of the dam, but it is expected that a portion of this year's rainwater can be conserved for use in the valley during the dry months.

The Little Rock Creek Irrigation District was originally organized in 1892 under the Wright Act. The Palmdale Irrigation District was formed under the California Irrigation District Act in 1918. Later the two districts united for the purpose of erecting the big dam, now under way, and with the completion of the project, great forward impetus for the whole section is exjected.

ATTENDED PREMATURELY

A prominent East High School teacher in a conversation recently related the following at his own expense:

I was in the university and missed an important drill one day, and when I reported on the following day the commandant asked for an explanation. I told him that I was very sorry to have been absent, but had attended the funeral of a prominent man with whom I was well acquainted.

"Oh, is that so?" was his rejoinder. "Well, I'm sorry that you were so early, but as it happens, I am going to attend his funeral this afternoon."

For that one I was sentenced to extra hard drill for a long period of time.—[Columbus Dispatch.

Water has been the controlling factor in establishing high productive land since time immemorial. The Government of the United States has expended millions upon millions of dollars in reclamation projects throughout this great nation to have homes for our people and give them assurance of water for their crops. Southern California land requires water. Land without water is of practically no value. Water is king.

The Fontana Farms Company is offering its vineyards for sale and supplies a share of water with each acre sold. Its irrigation system is one of the finest in the entire country. It was installed at a cost of exceeding a million and a half dollars.

Visit Fontana today. If possible note along the way the irrigation pipe lines if you would fully appreciate the value of irrigation. Just talk to the vast number of successful fruit growers whom you meet.

A rainy season is insufficient. Water is required during the summer season when there is no rain. Fontana Irrigated Vineyards are the most famous in Southern California. LARGE CROWDS SEE EXHIBIT

Architectural Show This Year Big Success

Over Thousand Sketches Enter Competition

Awards Also Made to Owners of Buildings

Six thousand people visited the architectural exhibit now being held in the Art Museum at Exposition Park on the opening day, last Sunday, an evidence of the widespread interest which the exhibit is arousing in Los Angeles. The exhibit, open daily except Wednesday afternoon, will continue through the entire month.

The Southern California chapter of the American Institute of Architects, of which Sumner P. Hunt is president, arranged the exhibit, which is confined to the work of local architects who have been licensed to practice by the State of California. Affiliated with the institute chapter in putting on the exhibit is the Los Angeles Architectural Club, an association comprising some 350 members composed both of architects and of draughtsmen. Clifford A. Truesdell is the president of the Architectural Club, while Edwin Bergstrom is the chairman of the general committee in charge of the exhibit.

Over a thousand entries, consisting of photographs and drawings, were made by the architects of Southern California, and by the draughtsmen of the Architectural Club. Photographs of recent buildings, in some cases the drawings which preceded the erection of the buildings, in other cases the drawings of the buildings contemplated for the coming year. European sketches, working details made by draughtsmen and architects studying in Europe, student work by the architectural schools of the University of California, Southern Branch, and the University of Southern California, student work of the atelier of the Los Angeles Architectural Sketch Club, drawings and details made by some of the best interior decorators in the city, together with drawings and photographs by the leading landscape architects in the city, go to make an interesting and instrucitve collection which totally covers the walls of the great exhibit room at the Art Museum.

Perhaps the item which has most interested the architects in the matter of the exhibit is the various medals of award which have been given out by a jury composed of hree noted San Francisco architects, who spent a part of Christmas week in Los Angeles, judging the exhibits before they were hung. The jurors were John Galen Howard, the architect for the buildings at Berkeley and the professor of architecture for the University of California; Arthur Brown, Jr., architect for the City Hall at San Francisco and who received a year ago a special medal for his work in architecture from the French Republic, and Ernest Coxhead, who though for the past two decades a San Francisco architect, will be remembered by the old residents of Los Angeles for the work he did here in he early days, such as the Church of the Angels at Annandale and the Bolsa Chica Gun Club.

The grand prize for the year, technically named the award of "Distinguished Honor in Architecture," goes to Robert D. Farquhar, architect for the W. A. Clarke, Jr., mausoleum, of which Thomas C. Marlowe was the superintendent in charge of construction.

TO HOLD DINNER

On Tuesday night of this week the Los Angeles chapter of the Institute of Architects will make the award to the owners of the various buildings receiving a medal for the year, to the contractors who erected the buildings and to the architects who designed and superintended the work. The presentation will be made at a dinner given at the University Club, to which all of the groups representing owners, constructors and architects have been invited.

The awards to contractors were limited to the general contractors and to those whose labor or material contributed to the decorative or artistic effect. The large number of residences and the six separate awards for residence work are a special feature of the exhibit.

The exhibition has been looked forward to by both the architectural fraternity and the public with great interest because of the fact that not since before the war has the current work of the offices been assembled and at no time in the past has there been such a large volume of splendid material to present.

The awards, in detail, are as follows:

REDLANDS LAYS PLAN FOR YEAR

Will Attempt to Get Main Railroad Line Through City; New Hotel Projected

[LOCAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

REDLANDS, Jan. 13. — The Chamber of Commerce of Redlands will this year bend every effort to bring to a successful conclusion its campaign to get a main-line railroad through Redlands and also to establish here a new-type hotel for the benefit of winter tourists, the small-unit hotel where the surroundings are homelike. H. R. Yerxa, the president of the Chamber of Commerce, considers these two matters of prime importance.

An advertising campaign to bring the city and its advantages before the people who are brought to California by the All-Year Club advertising is also planned, a campaign to be centered in Los Angeles, for it is recognized here that Los Angeles is the destination of something over 90 per cent of the people coming to California to make their homes.

William Sproule, president of the Southern Pacific, has in answer to telegrams sent him by all leading shippers of Redlands, promised to come here early in the year to go over with the committee plans for running the main line of the Southern Pacific, now going through San Timoteo Canyon, through Redlands and into the Yucaipa Valley and then Beaumont and Banning.

It is known that the Southern Pacific is figuring on double-tracking all through California soon, that traffic on the road has reached the point where more trains cannot be run economically on a single track. It will be the effort to get the road to build this line now, to become a part of the double-tracking later.

Figures will be given to show that as good a grade can be secured as through the San Timoteo Canyon, a rich producing country can be tapped and the apple shipping of the Yucaipa Valley well taken care of. Capt. P. N. Hasbrouk has secured crop figures for the entire territory that will be of interest.

The hotel proposition is rapidly working out and it is believed that Redlands will soon have the first unit of what is planned as a unique hotel system for the city, one that will be a whole of small units so as to make them more homelike and appealing to the winter visitor.

SOUTHWEST TO GET MEXICAN BANANAS

Shipments of bananas by rail to the Southwest is assured by an experimental carload from Oaxaca State, Mexico, last month, which arrived in good condition. Consul Harry L. Walsh, Nuevo Laredo, informs the Department of Commerce that the promoters have been assured a three-day delivery from the shipment point in Oaxaca to the American border at Nuevo Laredo, and if this seventy-two-hour service can be maintained over the Mexican lines the success of the enterprise would seem assured.

The principal drawback to this rail movement from Oaxaca is the high freight express, the charges approximating 104 per cent of the cost of the bananas at the shipping point. This feature, however, is somewhat offset by the fact that the retail banana prices in the Southwestern United States are from 60 to 150 per cent higher than at points east of the Mississippi.

the opening of "AMERICA'S MOST BEAUTIFUL SUBURB" today

WE TAKE pride in announcing the opening today of "America's most beautiful suburb"—the hillslope lands belonging to the Hollywood Country Club. For this exclusive club we are to subdivide all its land except that used for buildings and golf course. The first unit, 110 large hillslope lots, is offered to a discriminating public today.

It is our belief that in the near future Ventura Boulevard hillside homes will comprise Los Angeles' best residential district. It will be known nationally in the rank with San Francisco's Burlingame district, Chicago's Lake Forest and New York's Long Island.

Many of our lots look over the Country club grounds. A suburban home and a country club combined. All have a superb view of the mountains and the valley. The beauty of this tract is exquisite.

Beautiful winding drives, bridle paths and trails eliminate ordinary hillslope grades. Restrictions are as to type and character rather than as to price of your home.

Social Membership in Hollywood Country Club Given to Each Buyer

WE HAVE arranged with the Hollywood Country Club to present each buyer with a social membership in this exclusive institution, subject, naturally, to the usual scrutiny of the club's membership committee. This alone is an asset which will be appreciated by men and women seeking sites for the ideal home!

LOTS range from ½ to 2½ acres. They are priced exceptionally low — $1000 to $6500, with suitable terms. Water, gas and electricity will be in, without cost, Hard-surfaced drives will curve through the tract, lighted by artistic electroliers. Canyon roads bring wonderful Mulholland scenic drive within four minutes' ride. Study the map below.

Fourteen minutes to Beverly Hills when the canyon drives are complete. Fifteen minutes now to Hollywood — 35 to Los Angeles. A suburban home close to teeming metropolis, the mountains, the ocean. And the man of modest means as well as the millionaire may and will live here.

Golf, riding, driving at your doorstep! All the delights of the open country; all the city's advantages. You are cordially invited to an early choice today. Drive out Cahuenga avenue and Ventura Boulevard to tract office near the club. Horses furnished those who desire to ride over the bridle paths.

BUILDING PACE IS SPEEDED UP

This Month's Record Better Than That of First Part of Last January

During the first eleven days of 1923, 1692 building permits have been issued by the local building department. These permits represent a total valuation of $8,857,034. For the first half of this week 844 permits were issued and represented a valuation of $2,410,097. During the first nine days of January, 1922, that the building department was open, 1384 permits were issued. The valuation for these permits was $2,907,662.

Woolen Mills Take Head of Company East

Lemuel J. Coburn, president of the Pioneer Pacific Worsted Company, is on his way to the East for the purpose of securing estimates on machinery and other equipment which will be used in the factories which the company will erect in Los Angeles and the immediate vicinity. Mr. Coburn left Los Angeles last Thursday. He will remain in the East for a brief period.

It was the intention of Mr. Coburn to confer with textile engineers while in the East, as well as with officials of firms which manufacture textile machinery.

When plans for the $1,000,000 industry were announced exclusively in The Times, Mr. Coburn stated that he would have a number of eastern associates in his project. Plans for the erection of the several plants will be considered by these men during the time that Mr. Coburn is in the East.

MATERIAL COMPANY ADDS NEW CRUSHER

By the addition of a new unit to its plant at Corona, the Blue Diamond Materials Company, 2200 East Sixteenth street, has effected an important improvement.

The plant is located near the company's quarries, where Blue Diamond stone is mined. By the addition of the new unit, the company is able to supply Blue Diamond stone in any size required by architects or contractors on the local market. In addition to this increase in flexibility, the unit adds materially to the capacity of the crushing plant.

The new unit, according to officials of the Blue Diamond Company, was added in anticipation to a heavy volume of business in 1923, resulting from the vast amount of building projected for the next twelve months.

NEW SUBDIVISIONS APPROVED

City Planning Commission Paves Way for Erection of Large Apartment Court to Cost Three-quarters of Million Dollars

Twenty subdivisions were presented to the subdivisions committee of the City Planning Commission at the regular meeting of that body. All of the maps were approved; twelve of the approvals, however, were granted conditionally.

The map of the tract on which A. A. Daugherty plans to erect an eighty-five unit apartment court was approved by the Executive Committee after the subdivisions committee failed to reach a decision. Sumner Hunt, William Mead and C. L. Welch voted for the proposition as advanced; those voting against the tract were: F. B. Harbert, Lyman Farwell and H. W. Withey.

It is the plan of Mr. Daugherty to commence erection of the building on the tract as soon as final approval is given the tract. The City Council approved the map on Tuesday and it is now before the Board of Public Works. That tract is located between Second, Third, Witmer and Columbia streets. It is the plan of the promoters to sell the several units. It is understood that the court will be operated on the community apartment plan. Each unit will provide room for two families.

INDUSTRIAL TRACT

Hugh Evans appeared before the committee with the map of tract 5999. He declared that he intends to develop an industrial subdivision on the property which is south of Slauson avenue and west of Western avenue. The committee approved the map on condition that a sixty-foot east and west street be extended through the tract; that all north and south streets be made sixty feet wide with the exception of the one in the rear of Western avenue; and that thirty feet be dedicated to the city along the south line of the property as a half of a street that will be opened later.

Tract 6027 located north of Ventura Boulevard and east of Woodman avenue was approved on condition that Woodman avenue be made sixty feet wide and that an alley in the property be made twenty feet wide.

Property on Whitley Heights described as tract 5746 was approved on condition that two lots be provided instead of three. This property is north of Wedgwood Place.

Tract 2492 north of North street and east of Palm avenue was approved on condition that storm drain easements be granted the city. Tract 5264, located north of Washington street and east of Partenico street was approved. Tract 5691 located south of Wilshire Boulevard at Detroit street was approved. Tract 5793 south of Wilshire Boulevard and west of Ridgely Drive was approved on condition that storm-drain easements be granted.

Approval was granted to the map of tract 5294 on condition that twenty additional feet be provided for Ventura Boulevard and that north and south streets be made sixty feet in width.

Property located south of St. Charles street and east of Minerva avenue, described as tract 5913, was approved as a subdivision. Tract 5864, located North Sixteenth street and east of Ardmore avenue was approved.

Widening Marengo avenue to eighty feet was provided for in the approval of tract 5774, located north of Marengo avenue at Kingston street.

Tract 5641, north of Arizona street and east of Oak street was approved on condition that storm-drain easements be granted. Tract 5505 north of Anaheim street and west of Hyatt avenue was approved on condition that seven additional feet be provided for Anaheim street.

Unconditional approval was granted to tract 5993 and 5892. The former is located south of Bay street and east of Wilson street; the latter is north of Riverside Drive and west of Gleneden street.

Tract 6006 south of Pico street and at Clenega Boulevard was approved on condition that provision be made for adequate drainage. Tract 5869, located north of Sixth street and west of Loma Drive was approved. Tract 5973, south of Twenty-fourth street and east of Velasco street was approved on condition that all alley widths be made fifteen feet.

BUILDING PROGRAM CONTINUES AT DELANO

[LOCAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

DELANO, Jan. 13.—This city has been the scene of a phenomenal building program during the past few months. Chief among the improvements is the new Cecil avenue Grammar School which is to be occupied next week. The building occupies a splendid location just across the street from the Delano Joint Union High School to the south on a seven acre site which was purchased last year by the school.

Bonds for $40,000 were voted for the present building, which is the first unit of a larger school, as it is planned to add several more class rooms and a large auditorium within a short period of years. This unit has been built at a cost of $40,000 and the complete building is expected to cost some $125,000.

The building is built of red brick and the roof is of tile. Orville L. Clark of Bakersfield, is the architect. C. Roesler, formerly of the board of trustees, has been the building inspector. Four class rooms, office-room, supply rooms and a rest-room make up the building.

The Southern California Edison Company has started the erection of a large garage building on its property on Cecil avenue in the block just west of the new school. The cost is to be $20,000.

LOTS SELL RAPIDLY

David Barry, Jr., of Barry & Co., reports that during the past few days about ten lots daily are being bought in Wilshire Highlands, the five blocks southwest of the Los Angeles High School. The improvements are being rushed in preparation for the numerous lot purchasers who desire to build, according to the subdividers.

NEW NORWALK TRACT

Walter Greening, local subdivider, has opened a new tract near Norwalk consisting of 163 lots. Improvements including sidewalks, curbs, and public utility systems are to be installed.

Orange Paving Program Takes in Big District

[LOCAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

ORANGE, Jan. 13.—Work will be started at once on a $120,000 paving improvement program for Orange. The contract covers streets twenty-five blocks long. The material will be of concrete seven inches thick. It is estimated that from four to six months will be needed for the work, which, when completed, will give to the town a total of seven miles of paving.

Bids for the paving of Pine street will be opened on the 16th inst. A considerable portion of this street, together with is immediate vicinity, was vacant ground less than two years ago, but since then has been developed into a residence district with numerous bungalows.

Ornamental lighting fixtures have been installed on Pine street, a movement that is expected to be followed elsewhere in the residental portion of Orange.

Paving on East Chapman avenue will be open to traffic early in February. This provides a highway to the Orange County Park, a 160-acre resort maintained by the county.

AMERICA BIG BUYER

Brazil shipped out 791,534,173 pounds of coffee during the first six months of 1922 to a value of $87,089,747, according to Vice-Consul Hickerson, Rio de Janeiro, in a report to the Department of Commerce. This coffee was entireyl from the 1921 crop, as the new harvest did not begin to move until September. The United States, France, Holland, Great Britain and Italy led in receipts in the order named, the American proportion amounting to 42 per cent of the total shipments.

To Represent Local Board at Florida Meet

George W. Dickinson was selected by the governing committee of the Los Angeles Realty Board to take the place of the national committeeman, W. W. Mines, as the representative of the local organization at the midwinter meeting of the National Association of Real Estate Boards and he left yesterday for Jacksonville, Fla., in company with W. I. Hollingsworth, former president of the local board, who is a director of the national association. Mr. Mines was unable to attend.

The business meeting will be held the 17th to 19th insts., and will be followed by a trip through Florida.

MORE ZINC FOUND IN SWEDISH FIELDS

Two ore deposits of considerable extent have been discovered in the vicinity of the Bjudfors field in Norsjo, one containing zinc ore and iron pyrites, according to advices received by the Department of Commerce. Drillings in the second have revealed an unusually rich copper ore of considerable thickness and length and fairly uniform in quality.

The Swedish Geological Survey is at present engaged in investigating this section, since it has easy access to the main railroad lines and also because, according to geological calculations, important deposits should be hidden there.

Note the Superior Advantages of Mansfield Knoll and Wilshire Highlands

Better location In the close-in Wilshire district, which means these tracts are in the best part of town. Not only that, but they are across the street from the built-up section.

Improvements advancing Wilshire Highlands and Mansfield Knoll are ready for homes as the bulk of the slow grading work is finished. Domestic utilities are being rapidly installed.

More important thoroughfares Nowhere else can you find such a remarkable number of prominent boulevards. They are measured in miles, not blocks. Find them on the map.

Lower prices These lots are being sold direct from original owner to purchaser, without the customary middlemen to inflate the prices. Homesites can be bought on reasonable terms—$1800, $2000, $2200.

Nearer to Los Angeles High School Mansfield Knoll and Wilshire Highlands are close to the splendid Los Angeles High School, which means that the lots will remain in steady demand, and that income property will rent for more.

Close to P. E. subway Note on the sketch above the car line from the proposed subway running through this property. Think what the construction of this subway will mean to lots in Wilshire Highlands and Mansfield Knoll.

Over a million dollars' worth of lots have been bought in these tracts. You are not the first to make this comparison, but with prompt action you may be one of those to profit by it.

LAMANDA PARK SECTION ACTIVE

Extension of Walnut Street Cause of Sales

Business Sites on Colorado Change Hands

Office and Store Building to be Built Soon

By a "Times" Staff Correspondent

PASADENA, Jan. 13.—Since the annexation of Lamanda Park to Pasadena and the decision to extend Walnut street east to the Foothill Boulevard, real estate values in the suburb and adjacent territory have received great impetus. Walnut street will form a through boulevard from North Orange Grove avenue in Pasadena to Lamanda Park when the project is completed. At present Colorado street is the only through link between the two communities.

Real estate activity is particularly evident on East Colorado street, the main business thoroughfare. One of the largest sales of the week was that of the lot at the northeast corner of Huntington Drive and Colorado street, opposite the Pacific Electric station. The lot, 65x135 feet, was sold by the First Trust and Savings Bank of Pasadena to eastern investors, whose names have been withheld, for a consideration of $13,500. Only a few months ago the bank bought the property for $6500, expecting to build a branch at that location.

Property near the corner of Huntington Drive and Colorado street is particularly valuable because of the fast service to Los Angeles on the Sierra car line, which passes through Lamanda Park, in addition to the local service to Pasadena. Three lots east of the corner were sold Wednesday by the Huntington Land and Improvement Company to the Pippitt Brothers, Pasadena realtors. With a total frontage of 111 feet and a depth of 135 feet, the lots were sold for $16,500, or $150 a front foot.

Another sale on Wednesday was that of the northeast corner of East Colorado street and Annie avenue, two blocks east of the P. E. station, to J. R. Louis for a consideration of $10,500. The lot has a frontage of 100 feet and a depth of 135 feet. In the same section a lot with a fifty-foot frontage was sold to H. Williams of the Williams-Ohio Dairy for $5500.

East Colorado street is also the scene of great building activity. Announcement has been made by John Gibson, president of a chain of banks in Western Pennsylvania, who purchased the northeast corner of Colorado street and Mentor avenue a few months ago from the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, that he will build a two-story office building on the property costing $65,000. The building, 100 feet on Colorado and 140 feet on Mentor, will have five stores on the ground floor and forty offices on the second floor.

The southeast corner of Lake avenue and Locust street was sold last week by May Hanley of Los Angeles to an eastern buyer name withheld, for $8000.

Taking advantage of the project to extend Walnut street, the Standard Oil and Union Oil companies have bought two principal corners in the district affected by the extension for the erection of filling stations. The Standard Oil Company is building a permanent station on the southwest corner of Lake and Walnut, on a lot recently bought for $8500, while the Union Oil Company has just completed a beautiful filling station on the southwest corner of Los Robles avenue and Walnut. The lot was bought for $10,000. At present the city is buying property from landholders on the right of way in preparation for the extension.

Protection for Mexican Game

President Obregon recently gave his consent to a measure which is designed to protect the big game of Mexico by a ten-year closed period during which time no hunting will be allowed. The penalties are very drastic, providing fines and imprisonment for offenders, with the penalties double for second offenses.

PLAN NEW TORRANCE BUILDINGS

Nine-Store Structure Will be Erected at Large Cost; House Shortage Continues

Plans for the construction in Torrance of nine store buildings and one two-story apartment-house—to cost approximately $140,000—were announced during the past few days by Torrance, Los Angeles and Long Beach interests. Work on the foundations of five of the buildings has already been started and construction on all of the buildings is expected to be under way before the end of the month.

It is estimated that the building permits for the month of January will have a total valuation of approximately $175,000, which will be about half the total permits for 1922. The sudden spurt in the construction of business building, while anticipated to some extent, has exceeded all expectations and makes the prospects for 1923 the brightest in the history of this thriving little industrial city.

During the past year Torrance virtually doubled in population after experiencing a few years of slow growth. It seems reasonable now that it will more than fulfill the expectations of its founder, J. S. Torrance, who in 1912 foresaw the future of the city and its ideal location as an industrial center.

A dozen or so industries giving employment to approximately 4200 men are operating at capacity there and in most cases are preparing to increase their output during the present year.

With the opening up of the industries to full capacity a serious house shortage has developed with approximately 3000 men compelled to live outside the city until homes can be provided for them. It is the building of homes and apartment-houses for these men and their families that is stimulating the construction of business structures. Approximately $100,000 will be spent in Torrance in the next few months by the Pacific Electric Company to build homes for its employees now living in other communities because of the housing shortage in Torrance.

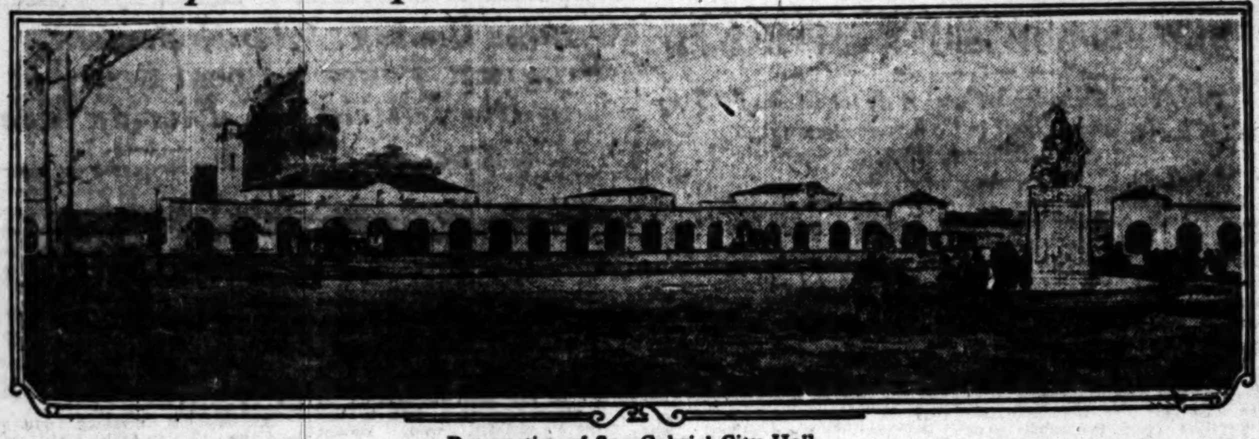
Municipal Group Harmonizes With Historic Setting



Perspective of San Gabriel City Hall

This structure along with the theater for the "Mission Play" and the San Gabriel Mission will give the city one of the most distinctive civic centers in the West. Walker and Eisen are the architects.

BUILD CITY HALL NEAR OLD CHURCH

Structure at San Gabriel Will Conform With Design of Mission

Ground has already been broken for the $50,000 new City Hall at San Gabriel and it is expected that it will be rushed to completion as quickly as possible. The site is located at the corner of Mission Drive and Ramona street. It is estimated that through the instrumentality of the Old Mission Church and the Mission Play, that 500,000 persons a year will view this new building.

The Mission Playhouse, the consummation of the life-time dream of John McGroarty, the Old Mission Church, the New Temple, the old grapevine and other places of interest in San Gabriel are all in the immediate vicinity of the new City Hall Building. The Spanish type of architecture, color, tone and atmosphere will harmonize nicely with its surroundings and greatly add to the general attractiveness of this unique little city. It is said that $1,000,000 are being expended by the church, the Mission Play and the temple interests, who are building a little hamlet of distinctive sentimental and inspirational value that will be the Mecca for thousands of tourists at all seasons.

If to these accomplishments be added the many new homes within and outside the city, it will be seen that San Gabriel is making progress. Gurden C. Harris, owner of the Bradbury Park tract on Las Tunas Drive, states that work will start this week on the erection of seven handsome homes in this beautiful residence section.

LUMBER OUTLOOK BRIGHT

The new year has opened auspiciously for the lumber industry, its prospects for 1923 probably being the best it ever had. Not only is the building outlook excellent throughout the country, but the general business situation is such as to warrant great expectations in connection with industrial trade. From the very beginning of the month there has been a steady stream of inquiries for large quantities of stock of all descriptions, and the speedy development of trade upon a broad basis is indicated. Inquiries from retail yards, both in city and country, are especially heavy.

Many of the bigger concerns began buying their spring stocks in December, in order to avoid the scramble for lumber which is expected to feature this month, but the majority held back until the holidays were over and inventories completed. There is every sign that these are now preparing to enter the market in a large way.

Industrial requirements are huge and pressing, and some keen competition for lumber is apt to develop between the various classes of buyers soon because of the growing scarcity of stock. The railroads appear destined to play a dominant role in the softwood markets during the next year, and will probably come into sharp conflict with the building interests.

The automobile, furniture and flooring and interior trim manufacturers are counted on to keep the hardwood market active and strong. The general lumber market meanwhile is firm and shows a pronounced advancing tendency.

Following the voluminous demand of the last several months of 1922 the mills as a rule are heavily overbooked and have very little to sell. They are already resuming operations following the customary holiday shutdown for repairs, and are planning capacity production. It appears likely that output during the next six months will be materially in excess of that for the first half of last year. This, however, will give no relief to the immediate stock situation, as the new lumber will not be marketable until some months following its cutting, and the expectation is general that a very severe scarcity of lumber of all kinds next spring is unavoidable.

PROUD OF HIS JAG

Dr. Friedlander West, the well-known prohibition leader, said at a banquet:

"Prohibition has turned a lot of temperate men into hard drinkers. It has turned a lot of law-abiding citizens into rebels. Why, a jag, which used to be such a disgrace, is now—but listen to this story:

" 'There goes Arthur Arbuthnot,' a lady said to her husband. 'Why didn't he speak to us?'

" 'Well—er—you see, my dear, Arthur is—er—full.'

" 'Yes, I know he's full, of course,' said the lady, 'but I never thought he'd be so conceited about it that he'd cut his old friends.' "—[Everybody's Magazine.

"Mash," the slang word, comes from the gypsy, "mafada," which means "to charm by the eyes."

OPEN NEW ALHAMBRA TRACT

Forty acres at the northeast corner of Fremont avenue and the Ocean-to-Ocean Highway in Alhambra is being opened today as a subdivision by the Frank Meline Company. This land is just across the Southern Pacific right of way from the community industrial tract at Alhambra.

This district is the scene of a great deal of subdividing activity at present. Most of the land which is be placed on the market or being prepared for subdivision is the property of the Huntington Land and Improvement Company. Fremont Heights, as the Meline subdivision is known, is a part of the holdings of the Huntington company.

No less than ten tracts have been opened or prepared for opening along the Ocean-to-Ocean Highway. No small amount of building is being done in the district. A great deal of the building activity that has characterized the development of Alhambra recently is being done in this section of the city.

Improvements are being made on a number of the subdivisions in the district. It is said to be the intention of the subdividers of Fremont Heights to install improvement similar to those which were placed in Ramona Park, the tract in the same district which the Meline company opened some time ago.

creased to 29,037, and last year to 37,077.

The State Real Estate Department has steadily turned back to the general fund of the State, a surplus of its license fee collections, Mr. Keiser said. "The State realty department is self-supporting," Mr. Keiser declared, "and this year will turn into the general fund of the State of California, about $46,000. The total revenue from the sale of licenses was about $166,000.

The head office is maintained at Sacramento with Chief Deputy R. B. Dunlap in charge. Branch departmental offices are at San Francisco and Oakland, and a deputy office where hearings are held is in Oakland. Edgar Williams is in charge of the San Francisco office, J. T. Anderson of the Los Angeles office, while R. Porter Giles is the Oakland deputy.

Concerning colonization projects, State Commissioner Keiser declared that the department "has refused to approve of any real estate development project unless sufficient money is set aside or provided by the promoters to guarantee development promised the investor. The approving of colonization projects is looked upon by reliable land owners and real estate men of the State as one of the most important functions of the department. Real estate boards and real estate men of standing everywhere are commending such work. The department has secured the organization of an association of land owners whose only purpose is to do what is necessary to re-establish California land projects in the confidence of eastern buyers."

A survey of the leading land subdivision projects in this State has been made by the State commissioner. This survey is on file at the Sacramento office. Water rights, title and methods of selling are passed upon by the commissioner under the present law. An amendment is being sought by the Land Owners' Association, and by the California Real Estate Association whereby it will become mandatory upon all land subdividers to secure the approval of the Real Estate Department before their land can be offered for sale.

Commissioner Keiser thanked the newspapers of California and the real estate boards for their cooperation in the work of his department.

LOCAL RUBBER FIRM WILL DOUBLE OUTPUT

Contracts for the new addition to the plant of the West American Rubber Company have been let, according to an announcement made by officials of the firm. The new facilities will be built adjoining the factory structure which the company now occupies at 400-432 North Avenue Nineteen.

The addition will be of frame construction 50 by 150 feet. The recovering department of the firm will occupy the addition. Additional equipment will be installed at a cost of $10,000 when the structure is completed. This will double the firm's capacity.

The West American Rubber Company specializes in the production of rubber novelties, such as are used by motion-picture companies.

WILL OPEN HOLLYWOOD CLUB TRACT

Local Realtors Put Large Hillside Home Sites Tract on Market Today

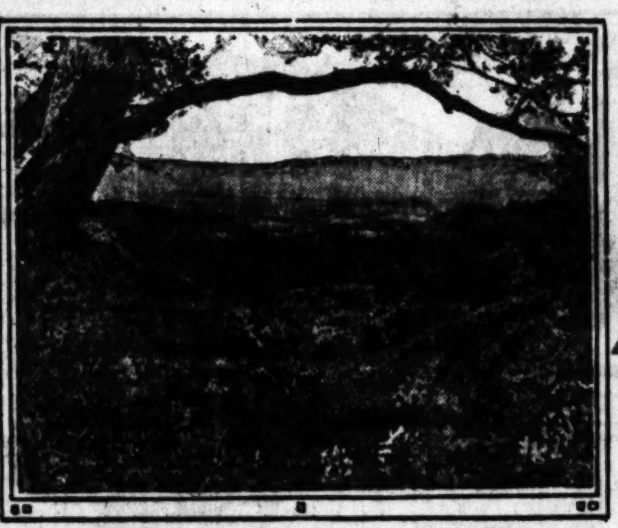
Another move in the development of Ventura Boulevard hill slopes into a residential district comes today with the opening of the subdivision of the Hollywood Country Club.

For months club officials have been working with Sunday, Merrick & Ruddick, Inc., who are to subdivide the tract jointly with the club, on the plans for marketing all the club's land outside of that needed for buildings and golf course.

Today 110 lots, ranging in size from three-tenths to two and one-quarter acres, will be placed on the market in the opening sale. All of them are hillside sites with a view of the mountains and the San Fernando Valley. Many of them look down over the Country Club.

The move of subdividing the Country Club's hillside land is in keeping with a plan of many realtors to develop all the land along the Ventura Boulevard for several miles into a residential district they are describing as "America's most beautiful suburb."

Vast View Provided From Tract



San Fernando Valley from Hollywood Hills

This view is from one of the canyons near the Hollywood Country Club tract which is being opened today.

A homes jury, to consist of D. W. Holt, president of the Hollywood Country Club, an official of the bank acting as trustee, and George M. Sunday, will determine restrictions on home building.

Water, lights and gas will be piped to all lots. Wide, hard-surfaced drives will wind about the hillsides, eliminating grades to below 12 per cent. These drives will be lighted with modern, artistic electroliers.

Scores of workmen have been toiling for several weeks trying to get these drives in shape for opening day today.

More Factories and Homes Goal for This Year

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

TORRANCE, Jan. 13.—With the election of Carl L. Hyde as president, the Torrance Chamber of Commerce inaugurated a program for the new year, embracing the construction of homes to relieve the severe house shortage, and the bringing in of new industries. The other officers elected were: Dr. J. R. Lancaster, first vice-president; George Peckham, second vice-president, and J. Wallace Post, treasurer.

It was pointed out by the new president that the population of Torrance had virtually doubled during 1922 and that if homes could be provided for the 3000 men in the factories and oil field who were compelled to live elsewhere because of the lack of housing facilities, the city during 1923 would equal or exceed its phenomenal growth of last year.

TRACT SALES REPORTED

Property valued at approximately $300,000 has been sold in the Home Villa tract since that subdivision was opened a few weeks ago, according to R. H. Malone, representative of the subdividers. This subdivision extends from Ninth avenue to Vineyard avenue south of Jefferson street. The tract has been zoned so that lots are suitable for business and income improvements.

FONTANA TO HAVE WOMEN'S CLUBHOUSE

The Fontana Women's Club has raised a considerable sum and expects soon to complete the balance necessary to begin the construction of its new community clubhouse on the Fontana park grounds. Like all of the public buildings, this will be of fireproof construction, resembling in style, the early Spanish buildings. It will have a large assembly hall and be fully equipped as a social center for the community.

The increasing number of settlers on the Fontana vineyards and groves, desiring instruction in horticultural subjects, led to the organization a few months ago of a free night school. This school now has well-attended courses in horticulture, automobile mechanics, languages and applied arts. The instructors come from Chaffee High School and Junior College and from the experimental stations.

STORE ROOM LEASED.

Robert Baker, realtor, has leased for the heirs of the George H. Pike Estate, the storeroom at 413-15 South Los Angeles street, to Ben Solnit and Harry Shapiro, who, after alterations are completed, will engage in the wholesale shoe business; also the southwest corner of Fourth and Los Angeles streets, for the same owners, to J. E. Harshman, who will occupy this storeroom for the sale of scales and cash registers.

HOTEL PLANNED FOR EL MONTE

Structure Would be Erected on Large Main-Street Site

Project Backed by Chamber of Commerce of Town

Community's Growth Creates Serious Housing Problem

El Monte is to have hotel, for which plans are now being prepared, to cost in the neighborhood of $75,000. The building is to be erected on Main street, on property now owned by the Presbyterian Church and Mrs. Mamie Ritter. The site has approximately 100 feet frontage on Main street and with additional frontage on Dos Palmas Drive.

The local Chamber of Commerce is backing the proposition, and is now making a canvass of local business men to see what support may be secured financially.

The building will contain approximately forty hotel rooms, six or eight apartments, two business rooms, a cafe and restaurant in connection with the hotel and new headquarters for the Chamber of Commerce. It will be two stories in height and built so that another floor may be added later.

El Monte needs a hotel, as scores of tourists are reported to have been turned away each night because of the fact that every available room in the town is full. The fact that the Chamber of Commerce will occupy the hotel as headquarters is said to insure its success, as the local Chamber has over 500 members.

The housing situation in El Monte is said to be serious. Applications for vacant houses and apartments have to be made in advance, as every place in town is full to overflowing. Bungalow courts, apartments and houses are badly needed in addition to the hotel.

American Legion posts of Los Angeles county are to be guests of the newly organized El Monte Post, Friday night, at the local Chamber of Commerce. Over one hundred legionnaires are expected to be present. The local post has now over thirty-five members. Permanent headquarters are maintained with the Chamber of Commerce.

The board of directors of the El Monte Chamber of Commerce have established a record for attendance at meetings which is probably unexcelled by any chamber in the State. For the past eleven months, the attendance has been 92 per cent. The chamber membership, over 500 members in a town of 1800 people, is thought to be the largest in the country, resulting largely from the work of the board of directors.

ASSEMBLYING PLANT

Architects Donald and John Parkinson have prepared plans for the addition to the assembling plant of the Ford Motor Company. The structure will be erected adjoining the building now occupied by the company. It will be 132 by 139 feet and two stories high.

The cost will be about $750,000. Russell & Alpaugh are the architects.

EXPORTS OF LUMBER AID HOME COSTS

Decrease in Foreign Shipments Overhead Causes Domestic Increase

That any artificial curtailment of lumber exports would have very serious effects upon the whole lumber industry is the opinion of Axel H. Oxholm, chief of the lumber division of the Department of Commerce. Answering advocates of such curtailment, who fear that foreign countries are drawing too heavily upon decreasing American forests, Mr. Oxholm points out that our lumber exports have never exceeded 5 per cent to 7 per cent of the entire cut, that they offer an important outlet for low grade lumber which is often a drug on the domestic market, that by absorbing surplus production they enable mills to run throughout the year, insuring uniformity of production and preventing heavy fluctuations in price and turnover of labor.

While other industries can adapt the quality of their output to the demand, the lumber industry can not. Low-grade as well as high-grade lumber is manufactured from one tree and an abnormal demand for high-grade stock usually causes overproduction of low-grade lumber. If a market for all grades of lumber is not available, mills must charge more for the qualities in demand, in order to meet the overhead charges. The exportation of low-grade lumber, of which the West Indies, for example, take large amounts, means lower prices for lumber at home. Present high freight rates from the Pacific Coast to eastern markets hamper the disposal of low-grade stocks in the eastern States and the natural outlet for this lumber is foreign markets. The western lumber States can not under any conceivable circumstances consume all the low-grade lumber they produce in meeting the high-grade demand, and west coast lumbermen agree that it was the export trade to the Orient which saved many of them from ruin in the slump of 1921.

In the Gulf States many large mills have been established chiefly to cater to the export trade. These mills are often in small towns with no satisfactory rail connections or so far from centers of consumption that freight rates make shipment to them impracticable. Elimination of exports would mean the closing of mills in both of the Gulf and Pacific Coast States, throwing thousands of laborers out of work, and impoverishing owners of timber land who, without an outlet for their logs, would be unable to pay taxes and other charges on their lands.

Other mills would be adversely affected, because their trade is seasonal. Such mills, without exporting, would have to close down or run short-time at certain seasons, experienced workmen would be drawn away into other occupations and renewed domestic demand would have to be met by the employment of new and less skilled labor, which would seriously affect the quality of output. Such fluctuations in trade would cause high prices in boom periods to make up for losses and might cause stagnation in building programs affecting the whole nation. A steady demand throughout the year which is possible, as many mills have proved, by a wise combination of domestic with export trade, would not only stabilize the industry, but emphasize the importance of a continuous timber supply, and consequently excite a more active interest in conservation. Reforestation on an extensive scale will not be practiced by private enterprise until it can be clearly shown that direct financial benefits will result. The export outlet, in short, is an invaluable balance to production and closing it would be a detrimental policy to the entire country.

OPEN BRANCH OFFICE

Walker & Eisen, architects, have opened a branch office in the Lilly-Fletcher Building, at Third street and Western avenue, under the management of H. P. Hess. This office will handle general architectural practice, but will make a specialty of residential work.

HERMOSA BUILDING

Plans are being prepared for a one-story building to be erected at Strand and Hermosa avenue in Hermosa Beach. The structure will be 100 by 100 feet. Robert W. Brydon is the owner and George M. Lindsey is the architect.

Broadway 7620 1068 South Broadway

THE CITY OF GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY

by E. A. BRININSTOOL

In the early '80's the First Baptist Church of Los Angeles owned, among other properties, the southwest corner of Fort street (Broadway) and Fourth street. The property had a frontage of 125 feet on Broadway.

Had the trustees of the church held the property until today, they could sell it for a "pretty penny," but they were then anxious to dispose of the lot, and it was accordingly placed in the hands of A. E. Pomeroy to sell. O. T. Barker, father of the Barker Brothers, himself a pioneer furniture man of Los Angeles, acted for the church in the premises.

The price asked for the property was $4000, or $32 a front foot. In March, 1883, Mr. Pomeroy sold the lot to Mrs. E. A. Knox. She owned it about one year, and sold it for $7500, nearly doubling her money. Since then the property has changed hands many times. J. M. Davies owned it in 1900.

At that time Mr. Pomeroy purchased the property for the present owner, J. B. Grant, paying $60,000 for it. Mr. Grant shortly thereafter erected the present seven-story building upon the lot. Today Mr Grant holds the property at $650,000. From $32 a front foot it has leaped to $5200 a foot in thirty-seven years, and as it is one of the most prominent business corners on Broadway, the price asked will doubtless be realized at no distant day.

ing department appealed to the Council for additions to its staff, in order that the work might be handled more quickly, but the appeal met with a luke-warm reception, and resulted finally in the addition of a few more employees—by no means enough to handle the volume of work which the department foresaw when it made its request.

A Profitable Department

While every department of the city government should be self-supporting, and, if possible, a revenue producer, there is no reason for carrying the idea that a department should be operated for profit to an extreme.

The report of the department for the current year shows total receipts of $331,100, with expenses of $198,441.22, a net surplus of receipts over expenditures of $132,658.78 for the year, or approximately 67 per cent of the total. In the twelve months twenty-six employees were added to the staff of the department, but, says the report, "even with this increase the present force is insufficient to properly take care of the inspections of buildings and of sanitary and plumbing and gas fitting."

No mention of the fact is made in the report that the checking department is badly in need of assistance, and that probably the greatest delay in the entire building process comes at this point, for inspections, although slow, are usually made with reasonable promptness.

But this year, in order to avoid a large amount of congestion in the offices, a portion of this surplus should be devoted to enlarging the office force so that this delay can be minimized. That delay can be entirely eliminated is, of course, manifestly impossible in these days of great building activity, but certainly the waiting period can be reduced to a week or ten days, and if building activity gains in the same ratio this year as it did last an increase will be necessary to keep the delays down to the three-week point.

And every indication now points to an increase this year over last that will make 1923 the banner year by heavy odds. Builders and architects are even now predicting a total of $150,000,000 for 1923, and these predictions are borne out to a large extent by work already in hand; work to be started within the first quarter of the year.

THE NEW YEAR

On Thursday evening the Los Angeles Realty Board will enter upon a new year of activity under a new administration, for at that time Frank Ryan, who has held the reins as chief executive for two years, will turn the administration over to Edwin G. Hart, a realtor of long experience in the business, and one well qualified for the task for which he has been chosen.

Mr. Ryan retires from office as the chief executive of the organization with the esteem and hearty good wishes of the entire membership of the board, for his two administrations have been signally successful in point of actual achievement. Under his leadership the board has made enormous forward strides; it has taken an active part in promotion of civic projects, and in many instances it has initiated worthwhile movements. Its membership has grown enormously, and the scope of its influence has increased in proportion.

Mr. Hart, a man of vision and enterprise, gives promise of carrying on the good work started under Mr. Ryan's administration. Mr. Hart realizes that 1923 promises to be the Los Angeles' biggest year in realty and building activity, and that the Realty Board has a big job cut out for it. Although Mr. Hart has devoted his efforts principally to the suburban realty field, Los Angeles has for many years been the center of his activities, and he has full appreciation of the problems of the rapidly growing city, and of the part which the Realty Board must play in the solution of these problems. Mr. Hart takes office with the support of more than 600 realty men, and with this support, much for the good of the community can be accomplished.

AWKWARD FOR THE DOG

His dog was a fierce Airedale, large and powerful. Its one fault was that it was a born fighter, and could beat, and had beaten, every dog in the neighborhood.

But, naturally, its coat grew long and curly, and had to be clipped.

"Yes," said the owner, "the clipping was my own idea. I believe it makes him look better; but it's very awkward for the dog."

"How is that?" asked a friend.

"Oh, the other dogs don't know him, and he has to fight them all over again!"—[Chicago News.

SIXTEEN YEAR RECORD SHOWS CITY TO BE BUILDING LEADER

Los Angeles' building activity after a great war surpassed that of San Francisco after the latter had been practically destroyed by a great five. According to figures prepared by the Southwest Builder and Contractor, in the past sixteen years San Francisco's greatest year immediately followed the fire of 1906. During the past five years Los Angeles has constantly surpassed the northern city in building valuation.

The following is the list of building figures for the two cities during the past fifteen years:

ACTOR DESCRIBES CITY OF ANGELS

The name of Los Angeles is Spanish. There are twenty-two ways of pronouncing it—all wrong.

It is inhabited by emigrants from Iowa and New England, tourists, real estate agents and movie actors.

Los Angeles is a seaport, situated eighteen miles from the sea. The only wonder in that is that they did not get it through to the Atlantic. For nothing stops Los Angeles.

They were short on water, so they ran a subway somewhere up into Canada and tapped the Arctic Ocean.

Then they had so much water they did not know what to do with it, and so they annexed another county to use up the water. Owing to these various annexes, Los Angeles is now the largest city, in point of farm acreage, in the world.

One of the greatest assets of Los Angeles, although it is never mentioned by its inhabitants, is its climate. There are two kinds of Los Angeles climate. Perfect and unusual.

Owing to the fact that all Los Angeles dwellers are either rich or hopelessly broke, it is a great city for amusement, golf, polo, baseball and bringing charges against the Mayor being the most popular.

There are more beautiful women in Los Angeles than any city in the world. But they all come from somewhere else—to go into the pictures.

Hollywood is a suburb of Los Angeles, and is called the "City of Happy Homes." This being caused by the fact that husbands and wives there always occupy separate homes.—[Will Cressy, actor, in "Stockton Record."

Peck, for the manufacturing of paints; also the store and basement at 206 San Pedro street, for Weldess Brothers, to Lew Gin, for wholesale and retail groceries. George A. Drollinger for the sale of used automobiles.

BOARD ELECTS OFICERS

F. M. Shepard and E. T. Oakes have been elected president and secretary of the Southwest Realty Board. The election occurred at the regular meeting of the board which was held recently. They will hold office for a year.

ARCHITECT SELECTED

Robert H. Orr, local architect, has been commissioned to prepare plans for the new $35,000 Christian Church, which will be erected at Santa Monica.

Etiwanda Has Century-Old Development

Material evidence that Etiwanda district is as inseparably identified with grape production as Signal Hill is with oil, exists in the old Cucamonga Winery, near Etiwanda, which was erected 107 years ago by the padres. Near by is one of the first vineyards which, although a century old, is still bearing an excellent yield of grapes.

Up to a very few years ago this moss-grown winery was in active operation. There still may be seen in the long shed at the rear the huge casks used for wine storage, with a combined capacity of many hundreds of thousands of gallons.

When Ramona, the heroine of Helen Hunt Jackson's novel, passed to the north of it on her pilgrimage to her haven in the San Jacinto Mountain, the Cucamonga winery was an old and weather-beaten landmark.

With this historic beginning, the Etiwanda Vineyard district has expanded until there are 22,000 acres in production of the highest quality, nonirrigated grapes. Prosperity is very apparent all through this region, with the trim cottages of new owners standing out in the well-kept vinepards. Record yields have been attained by a number of the growers.

SANTA BARBARA AMONG FAMED CULTURAL CITIES

Progress Characteristic of That Which Made Community Widely Known Is Furthered

BY T. C. HOLT.

By a "Times" Staff Correspondent

Santa Barbara is going to be the most distinctive, the most colorful home community in the world. It is going to be the country's center of art, music and literature. Ask any Santa Barbara resident, whether he be the multi-millionaire, giving princely gifts to the city's institutions, or the average citizen earning his daily wage among the community's activities. All are obsessed with this dream, and Santa Barbara is a community where dreams come true.

In the gradual working out of the details along which Santa Barbara's development is being guided, large growth has been scored during the past year. Official figures reflect and substantiate this growth and justify, say residents, the policies which have been adopted in working out the community's future.

BANK CLEARINGS INCREASE

Annual bank clearings for 1921 totaled, $42,470,938.25; for 1922 the total went to $48,275,719.97, or a gain for the year of $6,804,781.73.

Building development during 1922 called for a total investment of $4,450,985, as against $2,391,266 in 1921, and $982,456.85 in 1920. The larger part of 1922's total is represented in home construction.

Today Santa Barbara has a population of 25,000. In 1920 the Federal census gave Santa Barbara a population of 19,411. The city's census figures, the residents believe, are more than of passing importance in considering Santa Barbara's dreams. In 1890 the community had a population of 5862. The succeeding ten years increased this by only 723 residents, giving the city a population of 6587. During the next ten years the community added 5072 to its population, making a total of 11,659 for 1910. In the succeeding ten years Santa Barbara had a greater increase than in thirty years before, and in the last two years the increase has been greater than the decade from 1910 to 1920.

INDICATE PROGRESS

One studying these figures cannot escape the conclusion that Santa Barbara, in the dream of becoming a distinctive, colorful, artistic community, must be working along right lines, and that the abiding purpose to become a home community rather than an industrial, factory and shopping community, is not losing either wealth, growth or prosperity. That is the way Santa Barbara people feel about it, anyhow.

Santa Barbara, the people of the community will tell the visitor, is different. It possesses assets which make possible the realization of a wonderful destiny which the average community does not possess. Many communities must, by their very location, become merely Main-street towns. Santa Barbara, on the other hand, has inherited certain outstanding features which destine the community to become the colorful homeplace her people are working for.

These, in part, are that Santa Barbara is sun-kissed, mountain-girded, island-guarded; with a picturesque loveliness of situation looking out upon the sparkling blue Pacific, and having a climate so equable that every month of the year flowers of rich colorings and fragrance are found in profusion.

It is upon these features, found probably nowhere else to such marked degree, that Santa Barbara is building along distinctive lines.

WORLD ART CENTER

As a center of art Santa Barbara has attracted some of the world's most noted painters. Here one finds Ed Borein, world-famed cowboy artist; Oscar Carl Bong, Alexander Harmer, known for his canvases of old Spanish days; John M. Gamble, and many others of equal prominence, whose works hang in the world's best galleries. Musicians of wide fame, and authors whose books are among the best sellers, find in Santa Barbara the home of their dreams, while men identified with the large educational movements of the country believe in Santa Barbara's dream and are working for its fulfillment. Among such may be mentioned, in passing, Dr. Henry S. Pritchett, chairman of the Carnegie Foundation; Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler and others of note. No better testimonial could be needed than the statement that the Hon. William Gibbs McAdoo, war Secretary of the Treasury and Director-General of Federal Railroads, has chosen Santa Barbara of all the country as the one place for home-development plans on extensive scale.

In developing a distinctive community, Santa Barbara has chosen an adaptation of Spanish architecture as that best suited to the community's situation. This architecture, used in home and business construction, harmonizes with the old mission, which for 136 years has been a striking feature of the community. Much of the home construction completed within the past two years has been on this order, suggesting old Spain, by the tiled roofs and patios, or walled-in gardens, which create an artistic atmosphere with strong appeal to the imaginative mind.

SPANISH FEATURES IN HOMES

A feature of this building is the revival here of the use of adobe blocks, similar to those used in the building of the old mission, the presidio, Casa De la Guerra, and other notable structures which hark back to early Spanish days before the Stars and Stripes rippled above the city. From the site of the proposed home or business structure, the soil is taken for the adobe blocks which are to form the walls. It is interesting to watch the adobe block makers molding the blocks and to see the blocks arrayed over a building site, drying in the sun. Numerous sizable homes have been built of this material, and at least one large, two-story business block has adobe construction throughout.

The business blocks now being added to the city's store section are provided with a suggestion of tile roof, have arcaded fronts and richly ornamented entrances, all after the pure Spanish, and the fact that this construction, in a cold, business sense is successful, is seen from reports of merchants occupying such places, who say their sales' volume day by day shows large increases over former times.

This use of the Spanish architecture is bearing rich fruit. Now there is underway a group of new buildings, which are to form what is termed, for want of a better name, a "Street in Spain." In carrying out plans for this scheme, Casa De la Guerra is to be restored to its original appearance, at the time the Spanish commandante occupied a tower topping the casa, to sweep the sea with his marine glass to catch first glimpse of his vessels in-bound from far-away Spain. Into this notable group, also is to go the new City Hall, on which construction is now being started, and the new home of an evening newspaper, the News, which is far along toward completion.

SPONSOR SPANISH GROUP

Those in sympathy with this move to develop a community that will be different, have organized as the Community Arts Association. This organization has its advisory board of architects, the members of which, without charge, pass on all building plans submitted, and make suggestions, where needed, to bring the proposed structure into harmony with the Spanish, or to add to its beauty. This association also is working for development of community theatricals on a high plane, and some of the leading playwrights of the country are associated with the organization. Community plays already given have sounded the note of success. Restoration of the old Spanish playhouse, the Lobero Theater, is another activity of this association. In many ways, the influences of the Community Arts group is working for the distinctive, artistic Santa Barbara.

The purpose of all the efforts in the community's behalf is to develop here a wonderful home place and pleasure place for the entire world. The Carnegie Foundation has, among world-known organizations, recognized the feasibility of the scheme by donating $125,000 to aid the Community Arts' activities. The School of Arts, affiliated with the Community Arts, is still another factor working to develop Santa Barbara distinctly as an art, dramatic and literary center. Among its instructors are names well known in various fields of artistic effort.

GOOD YACHTING FACILITIES

Another move in this direction is the development of the city's yachting facilities. Santa Barbara is to become the yachting center of the Coast, say members of the Santa Barbara Yacht Club, who state that this feature alone will tend largely to add to the brightness of the city's future. Engineers have completed an exhaustive investigation into proposals to either build an inner harbor for pleasure craft, or a breakwater. The report of the engineers is expected at any time. Regattas held here have been marked with success. Plans for a yacht race from Santa Barbara to Honolulu and return, now being developed, merely suggest the magnitude of the yachting enthusiasm in Santa Barbara. None of these plans for either inner harbor or breakwater have to do with making Santa Barbara a commercial port. Shipping, it is believed, would destroy the city's ocean front for pleasure yachts and would be destructive to the wonderful beach which is recognized as one of its greatest assets. Nowhere in the entire world, it is said, is there a bay rivaling that before the door of Santa Barbara. Protected by the Channel Islands the mainland is saved from the raids of the sea during the hard storms, and finest of yachting and deep-sea fishing are here for all who love these sports.

Santa Barbara has the most unique boat-building organization on the globe. It is the Santa Barbara Boat Building Finance Association, organized at the suggestion of A. R. Padder, commodore of the Santa Barbara Yacht Club, along the lines of a building and loan association. Shares sell at $10. a share. The boy wanting to build a $40 boat can borrow $30 from the association. The association holds title to the boat until the loan is paid pack. A person wanting to secure a $400 boat can, in like manner, borrow $300, and so on. The boat financing organization has just been formed, and those backing it believe that during the coming summer it will have worked out so successfully that Santa Barbara's mosquito fleet will have found large acquisitions.

NEAR ALLURING MOUNTAINS

The mountains round about Santa Barbara, with their many alluring trails, are not to be overlooked as another asset in the development of a world pleasure resort. Thousands of dollars are being expended annually on these trails by the Chamber of Commerce, which is working hand in hand with other organizations to advance the interests of the com-unchanged under the new decree, it is explained.

Although Germany was the chief competitor in the sale of pianos in Mexico prior to the revolutionary period, and is now striving hard to regain the trade here which was lost during the great war, pianos of American manufacture have always been regarded as much superior in make and have been the favorite instrument among the better class of musicians. The German pianos are considerably cheaper than those of United States manufacture which are usually sold here and dealers are also given the advantage of buying them on long-time credit. It is stated that even in the face of the existing economic difficulties in which many business establishments of Mexico are involved German-made pianos and other goods are still sold on credit.

A HEAVY BUYER

For many years, exclusive of the revolutionary period, Mexico has been a profitable field for the sale of musical instruments of various kinds. The people of the country, from the lowest to the highest, are natural lovers of music. In a crude way they have been makers of musical instruments ever since the dawn of history. It is the expressed hope of government authorities that the placing of a 10 per cent ad valorem duty on pianos may lead to the manufacture of these instruments in this country.

GAS TRACT SOLD

AMARILLO (Tex.) Jan. 13.—Preparatory to beginning building a five-block zinc smelter to cost $400,000, the United States Zinc Company has purchased a tract of forty acres of land adjoining town to be used as a site for the proposed plant. Natural gas will be used and the laying of a pipe line to the proposed smelter from the natural gas field near here will soon be started by the Amarillo Oil Company, it is stated.

New Athletic Clubhouse for Local College

The construction of a $25,000 clubhouse for the athletic teams of the University of Southern California will be started within the next month, according to Gwynn Wilson, graduate manager of the school.

Mr. Wilson stated yesterday that the money for the building had been cleared from the box office receipts from the past football season, and consequently would not affect the finances of the school treasury.

It is planned to make the building one of the most modern clubhouses in the West. The lower floor will be occupied by the offices of the various coaching staffs, rooms where the teams can have blackboard talks, and a number of other necessities to a clubhouse. The upper floor will be taken up with showers, lockers, dressing rooms and an open gym floor where practice can be held when inclement weather does not permit practice on the athletic fields.

The new building will be erected on the site of the present training quarters, in the rear of the Old College, between Thirty-fourth street and Thirty-fifth street on University avenue.

ANAHEIM TO HAVE ICE PLANT

Newly Formed Company to Convert Old Brewery to New Uses

[LOCAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

ANAHEIM, Jan. 13.—With work on the improvement of the old Anaheim Brewery building, which when completed will be one of the largest and most modern ice and storage plants in this district well under way, the Consolidated Ice and Cold Storage Company, which is handling the project, has been formally organized. The following officers of the company were elected at a recent meeting: President P. G. Powell; vice-president, R. R. Davis; secretary-treasurer and general manager, O. G Orton. The directors include P. G. Powell, R. R. Davis, William LeVeck and W. R. Davis.

When completed, the plant will have a daily capacity of thirty tons of ice, making it equal in productiveness to any plant between this city and San Diego. According to officers of the new company, several large orders for the ice have already been received and there are indications that there will be a great demand for the product especially among vegetable growers whose garden truck is packed before being shipped east. The company is now filling its first large order in furnishing ice for packing cauliflower grown on 130 acres. It is estimated that 130 tons of ice will be required to fill this order.

Heretofore, vegetables have been shipped from Anaheim in refrigerator cars which carried ice only in compartments constructed for that purpose. Recently, however, several shippers tried out the plan of placing thirty or forty cakes of ice between the crates in the cars and also smaller pieces of ice were put inside the crates. The result was that the vegetables arrived in the East so crisp and fresh that the commission houses telegraphed local shippers to continue this method of packing, in spite of the slight additional expense, since a ready market had been found for the products.

Railroad Will Open Sites for New Industries

[LOCAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

VISALIA, Jan. 13.—The Southern Pacific Railroad has purchased twenty-seven acres lying on the west side of the company's tracks between Mineral King and Tulare avenues. The property is to be subdivided and converted into industrial sites to care for development in this line. The purchase price was $25,000.

R. F. Cross completed the transaction with W. P. Ballard, former superintendent of the Visalia Electric railroad, who was recently made industrial agent for the San Joaquin Valley by the railroad company. It was purchased from Mrs. Henrietta C. Anderson, Roy Jones and Mrs. Ellen Cox.

The Southern Pacific company is now well established with industrial sites for Visalia, having some time ago come into possession of the last property included in the twenty-nine acre piece lying north from the Edison plant. It also owns about ten acres in the west section of the city which is available for industrial purposes.

While neither the Southern Pacific nor the Santa Fe companies contemplate any immediate industrial development for Visalia, both recognize that this city is destined to grow rapidly and intend to be in the vanguard movement.

WILL OPEN TRACT AT SANTA MONICA

James R. White announces the formal opening of his new tract, Seamont, in Santa Monica to take place today. The property consists of forty acres, divided into 166 lots, and lies on the south side of San Vicente Boulevard between Fourteenth and Seventeenth streets. The land, of which Seamont is a part, was formerly owned by the Santa Monica Land and Water Company.

Contracts have been let for the improvement of the tract. The firm of Kneen & Austin, Santa Monica paving contractors, have already started the street work. Weather permitting, Kneen & Austin have agreed to have this improvement, about 3000 running feet in all, completed within sixty days.

Five houses will be started this week in Seamont by Mr. White.

BUILDERS ANNOUNCED

The Los Angeles News Company building, which is to be erected at the northeast corner of Boyd and Wall streets has been designed and will be erected by the Richards-Neustadt Construction Company. Edward L. Mayberry is the engineer for the work.

BUYS AT BEVERLY HILLS

Al St. John, comedy star, purchased a home site in Beverly Hills through Harrison Lewis of the Frank Meline Company. The location of the comedian's purchase is one of the finest view points in the district. A $25,000 home will be constructed for St. John on the site in the future. Plans are now being drawn for the structure by the comedian.

Alcohol Plant at Anaheim Is in Operation

[LOCAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

ANAHEIM, Jan. 13.—With a capacity of 3400 barrels of pure alcohol a day, the new alcohol plant of the Anaheim Sugar Company was in full operation today, following the completion of the distillery building and installation of equipment at a total cost of more than $50,000. The plant is located on the sugar company's grounds near the factory at the northern city limits, and operation is being carried on under the name of the Crystal Chemical Company, a subsidiary of the Anaheim Sugar Company.

The plant's daily capacity is sufficient to convert twenty-five tons of the molasses obtained during the process of manufacturing sugar into alcohol and, according to the management, a sufficient quantity of raw material available to operate the plant throughout the year, furnishing employment to twenty-five men.

As a by-product of fermentation, the company will also manufacture carbonic acid gas which is used principally by soda fountains and bottling works. The market for the alcohol is largely in Los Angeles and other points in this district of the United States Internal Revenue Department, and the production and distribution is under strict government supervision.

SELL MANY LOTS

More than 300 lots have been sold in seven weeks since New West Hollywood Tract was first opened. The development of the street work, gas, walks and curbs is being rushed to the limit. It is believed by those in charge that the entire tract will be sold out in less than three months after the opening date. The building activities in the original West Hollywood Tract have reached a total of over 100 new homes.

SANTA BARBARA GAINS FAME FOR CULTURE

where flowers are rich and plentiful in all seasons.

So this is why Santa Barbara is building as a different, a distinctive community, and her people invite the world to come along and help enjoy abundant health and pleasure in a place of eternal spring.

FINE WATER SYSTEM

To meet the needs of a city of 100,000 population, should such develop, Santa Barbara has poured out millions to complete a wonderful water supply and distributing system, to pave the streets and cover the foothills and mesas with paved highways. Plans for great reservoirs to carry water to every section are being made, and in many other ways the people of Santa Barbara are working for the realization of their dreams.

The fame of Santa Barbara has spread around the globe. This is seen from the daily arrivals at the city's hotels. This is seen as well in the persons who compose Santa Barbara's permanent population, which is made up of families from many countries, and among them many world-famed persons.

"How can a community exist without factories?" is asked, and to this Santa Barbara people respond: "Come and see," and after they have shown the visitor the rapidly growing business and residential districts they point with pride to the convincing figures, such as bank clearings, building totals and the census to show how successful is the plan of making a distinctive community.

NEW HOTELS UNDER WAY

And, confident of demand for housing, Santa Barbara today is building three hotels, to cost a total of over $1,000,000; and bungalow courts that in the aggregate call for $550,000 investment; two new thaters are planned for the present year to cost $1,000,000. An art gallery and additional school buildings are on the budget for the present year's construction, and a good start on either inner harbor or breakwater is expected. All of these, say Santa Barbara people, will be worth more to the community than oil wells, commercial shipping or factories.

The policies which are guiding Santa Barbara to what the residents believe will make it the wonder community of the world, rich in music, song, flowers, loveliest homes, and a happy, joy-loving people, has carried the city forward by leaps and bounds. The year's development, it is declared, has seen the home-building activities spread out to every section, and the business district steadily working toward a beautiful transformation, and the entire city, with increasing population, fully justifies the faith of its people, they say.

READY-CUT HOMES ARE SOLD FAST

San Bernardino and Alhambra Place Big Orders for Houses Milled in City

Evidence of the homebuilding activity in San Bernardino and vicinity is shown by the large volume of business placed with Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Incorporated, of this city. During the past ten days, Beckley & Harris, the firm's San Bernardino representatives, placed orders for thirty-five ready-cut houses. The total consideration for these will amount to almost $300,000.

Eleven ready-cut houses are in course of construction on South Electric avenue, Alhambra, for the firm's representatives in that city, George Sullivan, and a total of fifty are to be erected for him during the next four months, according to W. P. Butte, president of the firm.

Preliminary work of laying sewers, curbs and street paving on the firm's Wilshire Boulevard tract is nearing completion, states Mr. Butte, and formal announcement of the opening of the tract will be made in the near future. Fifty-one houses are to be erected on this tract representing an investment of over $400,000 which will be financed by Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Incorporated.

Orders totalling 257 houses were on the books of the firm for the first week of January, it is reported.

LOCAL SUBDIVIDER ENTERTAINS STAFF

The annual dinner tendered the sales and office force of the Angeles Mesa Land Company was given Friday evening, January 5, at the Jonathan Club, with President W. P. Jeffries as host and chairman.

Mr. Jeffries reviewed briefly the business of the last year, and expressed the opinion that the conditions and outlook of today were even better than those of a year ago, for the company; and predicted that the final eighty acres of Angeles Mesa, now being prepared for the market would be rapidly closed out under the constructive policy pursued by the company in all its operations.

Brief remarks were also made by several members of the organization. Those present were: W. P. Jeffries, W. R. Hilker, Sr., W. P. Nolan R. C. Spencer, C. W. Powers, H. L. Sullivan, G. Arthur Webb, R. B. Tabor, R. D. Kelly, A. DeBarr, W. A. Hagans, H. A. Bieber, H. T. Lucas and Charles V. Barton.

Ground Broken for New High School Group

[LOCAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

EXETER, Jan. 13.—Contractors are on the ground, and excavation work is rapidly progressing for the new Exeter High School buildings. This work will be pushed as rapidly as possible so that the buildings can be used for the next term. A bond issue of $150,000 was recently voted for this improvement and several buildings will be added to those already erected, giving Exeter one of the most modern plants of the kind in the valley.

Records of the City Clerk show that building permits issued since October amounted to $27,000. The year of 1922 marked the first recording of building permits, and although the last three months showed an average of $9000, it is thought that the monthly average for the year will be around $15,000, making $180,000 for the year.

The Triumph of Lower Building Costs

WRITTEN BY WM. P. BUTTE, PRESIDENT, PACIFIC READY-CUT HOMES, INC.

Automobiles were high priced until Henry Ford came along and hit upon the principle of quantity production and systematization.

In the production of Pacific Ready-Cut Homes the same basic principle has been adopted.

Mr. Ford secures his raw iron direct from the mine. He gets it in tremendous quantities. You can bank on it, he secures his iron at rock-bottom cost.

We buy our lumber direct from the forest cutters—in shipload quantities—and we accept only the finest grades. That's why we can give an unrestricted guarantee of quality.

You don't catch Mr. Ford buying materials from middlemen. He buys from the source to save Ford Owners the extra profits.

We likewise buy from the source and sell homes direct to the Homeseeker to eliminate all middle profits. We order the hardware, roofing, nails, etc., in carload lots direct from producers. Paints, stains, etc., are ground and mixed in our own paint factory to quality formulae. We operate our own sash and door factory. When you acquire a Pacific Home you can spend or save the difference, which invariably amounts to several hundred dollars.

Mr. Ford builds Fords and Lincolns—low-priced cars and high quality cars. The same principle of production applies to both.

We manufacture, sell and erect low priced homes and also the most elaborate designs—homes of all sizes, from 1 to 10 rooms. Don't get the idea that we build only small homes. We build all sizes and styles—Colonials, Spanish stuccos, flats, apartment houses, courts, etc. The saving to you is great in any case.

Mr. Ford's factories turn out 100,000 or more automobiles per month—by far the largest automobile output.

Our factory facilities are capable of producing over 600 houses per month—the biggest house-manufacturing establishment in Western America. We maintain 40 erection crews, we employ hundreds of master plumbers, plasterers, painters, masons and other experienced tradesmen—to give our customers the most complete service and a guaranty of satisfaction.

In Mr. Ford's great plants you will find every operation systematized—not a moment of idleness, not a single movement that doesn't reflect system and economy.

In the mammoth Pacific Mill every operation is accomplished in the minimum of time. For instance, one rafter machine operated by one man cuts, notches, bevels and finishes 5000 rafters per day ready for nailing—it does the work of 20 carpenters. Scores of other special machines earn like economies. The lumber is cut to finished lengths by machine, so that the carpenter can devote his valuable time to actual erection work, saving labor and preventing waste. It's no wonder we can deliver you a home at WHOLESALE COST and SAVE you 20% or more.

Lastly, Mr. Ford prices his cars F.O.B. Factory. We price Pacific Homes F.O.B. Mill, which includes materials ready-cut, interior mill work, hardware, paints, nails, shingles, doors, sash, etc.—or—we will quote you a price for the home erected on your lot, including: Furnishing of all labor and materials, plastering, plumbing and wiring, painting, cement work, permits, etc. You see, our homebuilding service embraces everything. We furnish the plans free. We keep 19 expert architects busy constantly preparing new designs so that you may select from hundreds of perfect plans. The quickest way to obtain proof of the super-value of Pacific Homes is to inspect a few and ask some of our thousands of customers their opinions. We'll be glad to give you addresses of Pacific Homes in your locality. More than 18,500 have already been sold. At our Exhibition Grounds you can inspect 12 sample ready-cut houses—exact duplicates of designs shown in our large Book of Plans. These are NOT portable houses.

Quality-built homes

Learn all the facts. Don't place your contract until you get our estimates. We've placed ourselves on record in declaring we can save you 20% or more. Now let us prove it!

—And remember!

If you build by the ordinary costly method—you're deliberately paying out several hundred dollars more than you should. On the other hand when you have your home built by the Pacific System you avoid payment of all middle profits; you prevent waste, eliminate delay and worry; you have the largest, most dependable Organization to handle the construction from beginning to end and you are guaranteed finest quality through and through. The Pacific System presents the very opportunity you need—providing quality homes at wholesale cost!

That's the story in brief—now it's your move!

OTHAM'S RECORD-BREAKING AUTO SHOW PROMISES WELL FOR INDUSTRY

W YORK'S SALON IS GREATEST IN HISTORY

Comfort and Efficiency, Goals Sought by Engineers at the Motor Factories

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH]

NEW YORK, Jan. 11.—New York's twenty-third annual Automobile Show, the greatest in history, and this is [illegible] spite of the fact that the superlative is often over- [illegible] closed its doors tonight after a crowd that threatened [illegible] the Grand Central Palace to the foundation had passed [illegible] the turnstiles.

Like the Lex- [illegible] the Princeton is powered [illegible] motor. The Prince- [illegible] is built at Muncie, Ind., [illegible] of the Sheridan car that was. In lines it resembles the old Sheridan. Five models have been brought out but real production will not be reached until April, it is said. The prices f.o.b. for the different models follow: seven-passenger touring, $2485; four-passenger sport touring, $2585; three-passenger sport roadster, $2485; five-passenger coupe, $3350; seven-passenger sedan, $3550, and seven-passenger sedan limousine, $3675. Radical changes in motor design have been conspicuous by their absence in the twenty-third annual show. The Chevrolet copper-cooled engine has been the sensation in this respect. The trend of the times is toward a change in closed car bodies and an endeavor to attain the pinnacle of comfort.

In this respect H. T. Thomas, chief engineer at the Reo factory for the past sixteen years, says: "You will soon see motor cars with small wheels and large tires rolling down the streets—tires built to carry twenty-five pounds of air and make riding just as easy as floating through the air on a witch's broomhandle.

Price reductions, he added, "will simply be a matter of production. I think the bottom has been reached."

NEW MARK PROMISED FOR RACE

Gas Chariots All Undergoing Preparations for Coming Event on Speedway

The roar of the speed producers again sends a chill of thrill running up the spine of sport loving motor race fans in Southern California.

A score or more of dare-devils are champing at the bit, basking in the balmy Southern California air while mechanics sweat over intricate mechanisms that will play a vital part in bettering the speed record for 250 miles in the coming opening racing classic of the 1923 season in the Beverly Hills bowl.

Quietly and almost without notice, preparations for the coming February 25, race date have proceeded until today any number of the prospective entrants in the go-fast classic are almost ready to turn up from 120 to 125 miles an hour.

None of the stars will hesitate in predicting dire things that will happen to Jimmy Murphy's record of 114.6 miles an hour, set up but a little over a month ago for the 250-mile distance, and it is certain to fall and be trampled under the boards.

Motor racing, because of the clean sport, the thrill, the broad meaning it has to motorcar owners, and the wealth of advertising it brings, has won a permanent home in Southern California and has established Los Angeles as a speed center without par save for Indianapolis, where racing, much slower, is held under entirely different conditions.

The huge throng at the last race here, variously estimated as consisting of from 70,000 to 85,000 people and forming one of the most colorful masses of humanity that has ever been gathered together in one place, warrants the prediction that the spring race meet, opening the speed season this year, will bring forth an even greater crowd to watch death courted at high speed during a battle of wits.

It is expected that Dario Resta, famed Italian pilot, will sit at the wheel of the sixth Durant Special, now being completed in the local plant of Harry Miller, automotive engineer whose products swept victory before them in practically every race last year. Bennett Hill, Tommy Milton, and Harry Hartz are putting in long hours working over their motors at the Miller plant, while the entire Durant team of five cars is now in Oakland, where work is being done at the California factory of the Durant Motor Company of California, under the direction of "Cliff" Durant, himself.

Miller, who has gained for himself a wrold-wide reputation in matters pertaining to speed and to automotive construction, is confident that 1923 will bring forth many startling events in the racing game, and enters the season full of confidence for his products.

MOTOR SALES WAY UP HIGH

December Figures Double in a Single Year

Motor Truck Deals Likewise Take Big Jump

Northern Part of State Has Lead on South

California's motor-car sales in December, last, proved to be the second largest in its automotive industry, also of the year 1922. It fell behind November, 1922, by just 402 sales. When we look at sales from a percentage gain standpoint, December, 1922, proved to be 99 per cent larger than the like month of 1921.

As former records have also shown, the passenger car division of the industry registers a larger per cent increase than that of the truck industry. In December, 1921, there were 7559 passenger cars registered by the Motor Vehicle Department in California. In comparison to these figures the same department's records brings forth a total for December, 1922, of 15,409, this leaving a passenger car gain of 7850 sales, the equivalent to 103 per cent.

The truck end of the business also shows a wonderful increase. The registrations for this State last December were 1554, whereas in December of 1921, 928 registrations was the goal reached. Analysis of these figures show a gain of 626 truck sales or 67 per cent to the good.

Summarizing the industry as a whole for the month of December, 1922, the figures represented are 16,963, which is just 8476 more sales or 99 per cent better than what was transacted in December of 1921.

The forty-seven northern counties of the State of California seem to have played some sort of a trick, not known to the writer, on the eleven southern counties. Southern California in November held the percentage increase by a 4 per cent margin, whereas in the month of December the north claims the honor, in percentage gain, by a 20 per cent margin, the latter's gain being 112 per cent and the former 92 per cen better than the like month of 1921.

Dividing the industry again, in Northern California the passenger car business made the phenomenal gain of 114 per cent, equivalent to the 3298 more sales made in December of 1922, than the twelfth month a year ago. The increasing number of commercial vehicles in the north is also very astonishing when we compare 599 new truck owners registered in December, last, as against only 320 a year before, the advance in the commercial field being 279 sales or 87 per cent better than the mark set in 1921. In using the combined figures of the passenger car and truck industries in Northern California there were released 3188

Motor Dealers Indorse Penny Gasoline Tax

At the regular monthly meeting of the Motor Car Dealers' Association Tuesday, last, held in the Blue Room of the Los Angeles Athletic Club, there was considerable discussion on the used car problem. The basis of the discussion was the unreasonable demands made by the owners of cars when they are turned in on new cars. The matter of a central appraising bureau was also discussed.

There was a general discussion also on matters that will come before the meeting of the Legislature pertaining to the good roads of California, and the association passed a resolution, a copy of which follows:

Whereas, there is apparent need of additional revenue for road purposes in the State, city and county highway systems for proper maintenance, and,

Whereas, a gasoline tax of 1 cent per gallon levied for road purposes against gasoline used in motor vehicles is fair in principle in that it automatically distributes itself in proportion to road uses,

Therefore be it resolved, that the Motor Car Dealers' Association of Los Angeles, indorses the levying of such a tax, providing that

(1.) The proceeds be used exclusively for maintenance. Original construction should in the future, as it has in the past, be made from the proceeds of bond issues.

(2.) That the proceeds be distributed between the State and counties, one-third to the State and two-thirds to the counties, the distribution between counties to be made on a basis of the amount of gasoline sales in each respective county; providing further, that the respective counties agree in turn to take over the maintenance of an equitable part of the major street system of the cities within the county limits.

PLAN HUGE PRODUCTION

Manufacturers Will Not Be Asleep at the Switch This Year; Schedules Already Announced

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH]

DETROIT, Jan. 13.—Automobile manufacturers are not going to be caught napping this year. One year ago at this period there was a feeling of uncertainty and hardly a manufacturer was prepared for the avalanche of orders that sprung up without notice and practically every plant was caught unawares. So overwhelmed were some of the factories that production was more or less throttled for the balance of the year. Evidence that this condition of affairs is not to be repeated is seen in the advanced productions schedules which are being announced almost daily, even before the results of the big automobile shows are known.

Last January, if anyone had predicted that 1922 would be the biggest year in the history of the industry, he would have been considered an object for pity. Now with conditions stable, it is possible to get a line on the volume of busi-

ECONOMY AT SACRAMENTO

New Boss of Motor Vehicle Division Promises Better Results

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 13.—Will H. Marsh, newly appointed Director of the State Motor Vehicle Department, has issued a statement outlining the policies he hopes to put into effect to increase the efficiency of the department and to cut overhead expenses. The statement follows:

Gov. Friend W. Richardson was elected to office upon the plain platform pledge of "efficiency with economy." I shall feel it my duty to assist him in carrying out that campaign pledge. The people have subscribed to a policy of retrenchment. The Division of Motor Vehicles can be operated more economically than it has been, and, incidentally a better service can be rendered.

I have carefully watched the development of the department over a period of eight years, during which time I have served it in the capacity of cashier. Its growth in the volume of business handled is best represented by a comparison of the sales of automobile plates and cash collected in the year 1915 and the one just closing. That first year of my incumbency we sold 163,000 pairs of plates, and collected in round numbers $1,600,000. This year we have sold approximately 800,000 plates and have collected over $8,000,000.

I have also watched the ever-mounting expenditures, and, had I not firmly believed I could assist Richardson in reducing the cost of operation, I would not have accepted the appointment.

Plans for a more efficient, more economical service are well formu-

Officials of the Automobile Club of Southern California are very much concerned over the peculiar methods employed by motorists in handling their cars at the street intersections in Los Angeles.

Weird and puzzling schemes are worked out by some drivers for getting across a street intersection ahead of the other fellow, say the club officers, which result in chaos and loss of time in the easy moving of traffic. If every motorist would handle his car correctly at the places where streets cross each other, there would be a notable lessening of confusion, it is pointed out.

In its "courtesy scheme" for making traffic move more smoothly, the Auto Club safety bureau suggests that autoists use quite a little common sense in approaching the corners where they are planning to make a right or left-hand turn.

If the turn to be made is toward the right, and two or three machines are lined up abreast, waiting for the signal to go, the man who is turning to the right should drive his car nearest to the right-hand curb, so that when he turns he will not have to cut across the lines of travel to make the turn. If he is going to turn to the left, he is urged to approach the intersection in the left-hand lane of travel, nearest to the traffic button, so that the turn can be made without again cutting across the paths of other moving vehicles.

More time is lost and more confusion results from general thoughtlessness on the part of motorists who make turns incorrectly than from almost any other cause, says the Automobile Club. And it is a thing that could easily be adjusted if the suggestion offered in the diagrams were followed closely, it is pointed out. And it is further pointed out that it is not only advisable to edge over to the direction in which the turn is to be taken, but that a correct hand signal be given at the same time. This is the law, also.

It is not enough to just stick the old family hand out like you were grabbing a bunch of atmosphere and dragging it into the car, but the family paw should be left outside long enough so that those

COAST ROAD A HARD JOB

Looks Like Last Place for a Motor Highway

But the Contractors Are on Home Stretch

Real Engineering Problem to Complete It

About the last place most of us mortals would choose for a highway is the site of the new shoreline stretch of State highway now under construction between Oxnard and the Ventura-Los Angeles county line. The immense cliffs around Point Magu drop a sheer 1000 feet into the Pacific. In many places there wasn't room for a mountain goat to make a trail, to say nothing about space for a thirty-foot highway. At the foot of the cliffs the ocean booms against the wall of rock with a noise like a battery of artillery in action.

The grandeur of the scene is impressive and awe inspiring—majestically beautiful beyond description, but as a site for a highway—well, M. L. Sullivan, the superintendent in charge of the work, says he simply had to tear the word "impossible" out of his dictionary when he saw it. A quiet little Celt, with keen, level eyes, is Sullivan. When he knew the job, the job became his very existence. Burros and horses took to the mountain trails far above the highway site, and carried in the drills and the powder. Men were lowered down the cliffs on ropes to drill the holes and plant the powder, and when the shots were made tons of rock were tumbled into the ocean, and finally a shelf for the highway was formed.

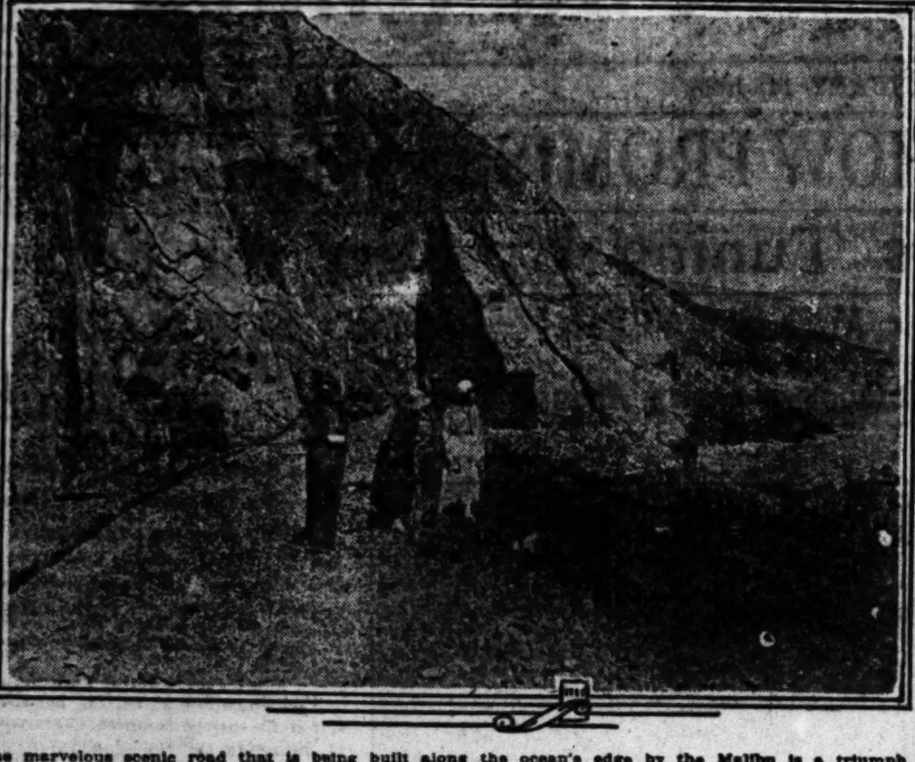
The work around Poin tMagu is progressing rapidly. The shelf is being graded to highway width, and level and the construction work is being pushed on down the coast toward La Jolla and Sycamore Canyons. When the road as proposed is completed it will extend from Oxnard across the sand flats below Hueneme to the bluffs, which begin at Point Magu, and continue intermittently to the Malibu. The road skirts these bluffs on a shelf built just above the breakers line. It is to continue on down the coast until it joins the present State highway at Serra, just below Capistrano.

When Warner Baxter, new star of Robertson-Cole productions, asked Don P. Smith, general manager of the W. P. Herbert Company, where he should drive in the new Cleveland six sport touring to acquire "highway building atmosphere," Smith suggested Point Magu, and everyone was delighted with the results of the trip.

"When the Cleveland sport first poked its nickeled radiator around Magu and we got that wonderful glimpse of the shelf of the roadway at the foot of those grand cliffs, we simply shouted wonderment," said Baxter on his return. "Climbing up one of the trails to the top of the bluff, we had a marvelous view of the coast line for miles. The deep blue of the ocean is whipped into snowy froth against the rock-bound shore and spray outlines the bluffs against the blue sea as far as the eye can see.

"The new sport model Cleveland, with its beautiful lines, just fitted into the scene, and one can well imagine in future years these comfortable cars skimming along the finished highway as a part of the picture."

A Wonderful—and a Difficult—Spot for a Highway



The marvelous scenic road that is being built along the ocean's edge by the Malibu is a triumph of engineering and will be a treat to motorists. The Cleveland Safety Car went up there for an inspection tour last week.

coming along behind can see what it is all about.

Make your hand signals definite and lasting, advises the club safety bureau. Do not dangle a limp bunch of fingers, like wilted asparagus, over the edge of the car and think you are giving a correct signal. Put the old arm straight out, or up or down, whichever you mean, with all the decision and precision of a Jack Dempsy.

Say it with straight arms!

Look at the diagrams carefully and the next time you approach a turn remember to ease over to the right or left, in the direction you are going, and then take the turn without cutting in front of the other lines of travel, which are moving in the same direction. If every autoist would follow this advice, venture to remark the Auto Club officers, the amount of time gained in traveling across town could be reckoned in so many minutes.

This is "courtesy," also, it is pointed out, as well as good sense.

FINEST MECHANICS TO BUILD MOTOR

The finest of skilled mechanics are necessary for the building of the Stearns-Knight motor, according to Lynn C. Buxton, and the great amount of hand work required in accurately fitting the pistons and sleeves to the cylinders means the production of a motor car that is bound to wear for a life-time.

"How many makes of motor cars are there that can boast of their cars running from 44,000 to 300,000 miles with never a penny spent for motor repairs?" asks Buxton. "They are very few and far between. That distinction has been reserved for the cars of highest-grade production in this country and for costly imported cars.

"The Stearns-Knight at the recently lowered prices makes it possible for the average owner to buy and operate a motor car that will run for five years with as good results as when it first turned a wheel. If the owner appreciates quality he cannot help but see it sticking out all over the Stearns. There is not one cheap feature about the car."

Good Lubricant Will Lengthen Life of Machine

"If ordinary lubricating oils would keep a perfect oil film between the rubbing or wearing parts of your motor at all times, its life would be prolonged indefinitely; but, under certain conditions this film is broken allowing metal to metal contact and consequently the wearing away of your motor investment," declares Earl A. Garrettson, Coast distributor of Oildag and Gredag.

"The object, then, is to use a lubricant which will prevent this metal contact under all conditions and Oildag, by forming a graphoid surface, does this work."

Oildag has all the good qualities of the best paraffin base oils and also carries enough Acheson's pure graphite to form what is known as a graphoid surface, which eliminates metal to metal contact and in so doing this it reduces friction, repair bills, adds pep and power and prolongs the life of the automobile."

ECONOMY AT SACRAMENTO

ated as a result of my best experience in the service and I shall have no hesitancy in putting them in action as rapidly as a consistent policy demands. Necessary changes, eliminations and co-ordinations will be made in consonance and a manner not to interfere with the even flow of the work.

No employee of the department now rendering efficient service, consistent with an economical program, need fear molestation. An orderly conduct of the State's business in this department will be henceforth demanded. Every employee will be expected to apply himself or herself to the business of the institution seven hours per day. Those who have formed the habit of applying a portion of the period of seven hours to paint, powder and cosmetics had better adopt other habits or seek new employment.

The Sacramento office will be made the factory of the division, and a reorganization effected which will have for its object the handling of a major portion of registrations by mail. There is no doubt of the department's ability to more efficiently and economically serve in this way.

A more liberal policy in the matter of tourist's registrations will be pursued in the future. It has been the policy of the department in the past to subject every tourist and his car, upon entrance to the State, to the closest scrutiny. Engine inspection for tourist registration only will be eliminated. Requirements of engine inspection will be demanded only in case transfer of tourist license to a California license is desired. California is inviting the motoring world to make of it a Mecca, and the department proposes to do its share in making the State all that we claim—a motorist's paradise. No motoring guest in the future will be subjected to summary, snap judgment, or unnecessary delay.

The 1923 renewal period is upon us, and will have first consideration. Plans for the handling of the campaign have been quite generally completed by my predecessor. However, it has been deemed advisable to delay the opening of the counters for the issuance of the new plates until February 1. On that date applications for licenses will be received and plates issued from the windows of all of the department branches, which are located at San Francisco, Oakland, Los Angeles, San Diego and Fresno, as well as from the main office in Sacramento.

Applications are being received at the Sacramento office by mail now, and it is planned to begin the issuance of the new plates by mail about January 15. It has been learned that many residents have been laboring under the erroneous impression that it was necessary to purchase their licenses at the counter in the respective city in which they reside. The simplest way for any motorist in California to make application for renewal of his license is to take the certificate from his car, attach his check in the amount required and forward to the Sacramento office. He will thus avoid the possibility of awaiting his turn in a long line at the counter, and he will be assured his plates and certificate will reach him in ample time to avoid any inconvenience.

The 1923 automobile tax becomes delinquent if not paid prior to March 3, and a penalty of 25 per cent automatically accrues.

certificates of registration in December of the year 1921. In comparison to this figure for the same month of 1922, 6765 vehicles or 3577 more than a year ago were registered, the per cent being 112.

If the automobile industry can be used as a barometer on all other lines of endeavor, neither Northern or Southern California merchants should be doing any crape hanging this year, for, from all indications, 1923 will even surpass the most remarkable record that the year 1922 reached in the State of California.

Southern California has to its credit a 92 per cent increase or 4899 more sales in December of 1922, over the same month a year ago, these figures being the total of both passenger cars and trucks. Taking the passenger cars separately, 4691 were registered in December a year ago as against 9243 last month, 4552 equaling the 97 per cent gain.

In the division between the north and south, the truck industry in Southern California shows a smaller per cent gain, but still a wonderful one. A count on the records in this instance reveals the fact that we are comparing 955 sales made as against 608 a year ago, leaving the net increase of 57 per cent, which is an equal of 347.

UPWARD JUMP FOR LEXINGTON PRICES

Word was received in Los Angeles yesterday by W. F. Seel, local representative for Lexington Motors, that the price of all Lexington models has been raised $100, effective in February. The notification from Connersville said here is no doubt of a safe and sane return to genuine prosperity and that the stiffening prices for materials forecast a certain increase in the cost of motor cars.

STUTZ OWNED BY SCHWAB

"The control of the Stutz Motor Car Company of America is in the hands of Charles M. Schwab and he is putting his resources and his energy behind Stutz to make it the outstanding success among motor cars," says T. C. Whitcomb, general manager for the Stutz-Los Angeles Company.

A new telephone stand has a memorandum pad concealed in the base which has but to be drawn out for use.

LAFAYETTE

Vestibule Sedan

It is a principle of the best custom builders that every element of design must have a practical purpose. The new LaFayette Vestibule Sedan was designed and built upon that principle, attaining a distinction unmistakably suggestive of the finest custom work.

The splendid appearance is due not only to skilful design and low body-mounting, but to a wealth of carefully thought-out minutiae, contributing to an effect of thorough-going quality and utility which underlies a beautiful exterior.

It is remarkably adaptable in its use. By the convenient raising or lowering of a partition in the back of the driver's seat it may be rendered proper and practical for chauffeured use, for the informal duties of a sedan, or for touring. This partition lets all the way down—a real sedan if you want it. Seven are comfortably cared for, with folding chairs, generous of proportion and well upholstered, for the sixth and seventh passengers.

REBUILDS BRIDGE

The State Highway Department is rebuilding a bridge across the small wash just north of the town of Newhall, and while this work is going on it will be necessary for travel to use the small detour which will be in effect.

The three detours on the coast road from Los Angeles to San Diego are in fair condition; these detours are located just before reaching Fullerton, between San Juan Capistrano and Serra Station and at La Jolla. The San Diego inland route offers excellent going although it is necessary to traverse approximately thirty-five miles of dirt road in stretches in San Diego county.

FAIR TRAVELING

Excellent conditions prevail east from San Diego over the Mountain Springs grade into El Centro. The inland road through the Coachella Valley and along the Salton Sea to El Centro offers fair traveling conditions, although one detour is encountered between Banning and Whitewater Station and another between the end of the pavement and Westmoreland. At the latter point the road is being graded and put in good condition.

The continued summer weather should be an inducement for the motoring public to make trips into the various canyons reached over the Foothill Boulevard. The road up the Arroyo Seco past Teddy's Outpost to Oak Wylde Camp is in excellent condition and the stream crossings are not deep; some construction work, however, is being done above Teddy's Outpost.

GOOD GOING

The Mt. Wilson road offers very good going to the experienced driver and the regular controls are in effect on Sundays. The San Gabriel Canyon is in fairly good condition as far as Berry Flats, approximately eight and eight-tenths miles from the Foothill Boulevard. Due to slides beyond the several stream crossings just above Berry Flats, it is not advisable to attempt going further. San Dimas Canyon can be negotiated without difficulty.

The road up San Antonio Canyon to Camp Baldy is in very good condition, and one can drive approximately two miles beyond the camp into Ice House Canyon. The road north from Etiwanda to the foothills by Lytle Creek to Glenn Ranch offers very good going at this time.

It is rather difficult at present to find any amount of snow within reach of the vicinity of Los Angeles, although, of course, plenty of it will be found in the higher altitudes.

PLAN GREAT PRODUCTION

ness for the current year. Conservative estimates of the output for 1923 point to an increase of more than 15 per cent over the year just closed, when 2,527,000 cars were manufactured.

With the inventory period over, Detroit motor plants are working at capacity on increased production schedules, although nearly 4000 executives and department heads were in New York this week for the national show.

A BUNCH OF 'EM

Total Ford production for 1922 is officially given out as 1,352,479. Last year Ford made more cars than all manufacturers combined. Yet, even this astounding record will be shattered, according to present production plans, for the current year. The January schedule calls for a big increase in production over a similar month a year ago and the output will be constantly increased until production reaches 6000 a day.

Lincoln figures for the year were 5378, the best in the history of that company so far. Daily output now ranges between twenty-five and thirty cars daily. This will be speeded up to thirty-five cars in February.

Dodge Brothers factories are working on a capacity schedule, the daily output having been increased from 625 to approximately 700, during the past week.

Hupmobile sales for 1922 totaled 35,000 cars. Production for the current year will exceed these figures, officials believe. Increased orders are coming in as the result of the recent price reductions ranging from $35 to $110 and the announcement of a new passenger coupe.

PLAN BIG BOOST

Studebaker with a 110,000 production record for 1922 has set its 1923 mark at 150,000. Five new units in South Bend and two in Detroit, now under process of erection, will make it possible to accomplish this feat.

The Gray Motor Corporation hampered by lack of factory space and inability of body manufacturers to deliver their products as quickly as wanted, is looking forward to its first big sales year. The Gray car, which has developed in 1922 from a blueprint to a reality, in nine months, is making a strong bid for favor in the small-car field. Production at present averages about seventy-five daily.

All the previous records for production of automobiles by the Buick Motor Company were exceeded on December 28, when the Buick plants at Flint and Detroit built 825 automobiles. This figure should not be confused with that of 1029 cars shipped on October 30, as production and shipping records are distinctive. This number of cars was built in the two Michigan plants, the figures not including production of the Buick Canadian plant at Oshawa.

General Motors Truck Company is in full swing after being shut down one week for inventory. Heretofore the company has taken two weeks for inventory, but press of orders prevented this year. The company reopened on a full-time basis with all employes back to work. There was no lay-off of men and W. L. Day, president and general manager, announced no cut in production was made. On the contrary, he asserted, production will be advanced slowly to meet increasing orders on hand and those coming in after the holiday season.

BLOOMER IN PLATES

Two distinct types of green and white automobile license plates for 1923, different in the arrangement of their lettering, may be observed in use on Detroit motor cars.

Approximately 10,000 pairs of enameled tags had been manufactured in the stamping plant of the State prison at Jackson, a little more than a year ago, exactly similar in form to those of 1922 when a number of cases were brought to the attention of State police in which automobile thieves and bootleggers engaged in rum-running, had enameled 1921 plates with the red and white of 1922. To prevent this in 1923, Charles J. Deland, Secretary of State, directed that the form of 1923 plates be changed so that the letters "Mich. 23" would be on the right side of the new tags instead of on the left, as in the 1922 plates.

Fifty thousand sets of the new plates were turned out before it was brought to Mr. Deland's attention that the State motor vehicle law specifies that the abbreviation "Michigan 23" must be at the left of the plate so new orders were immediately given that the style first used would again be adopted in manufacture of the tags. The second change was made after more than 60,000 pairs had been turned out.

Mr. Deland will propose to the present session of the Legislature that the law be amented to permit greater changes in style and specifications of the plate, in the discretion of the Secrtary of State.

There was no general shut-down this year at Olds Motor Works at Laning for the annual inventory on account of the large number of orders on hand. Various departments were closed for a day and a half only, but the volume of production at the factory continued uninterrupted. With the completion of this inventory, production was speeded up gradually to meet increased demand for Oldsmobiles, according to Guy Peasley, general sales manager. Peasley asserts December showed more marked improvement in sales than was expected and was so far superior to December, 1921, that factory executives decided to run straight through the holiday week.

WILL SPEND MONEY

Ten billions of dollars is the conservative estimate made for the nation's 1923 automobile appropriation. This huge sum is to be expended this year by the public for motor cars, necessary replacements and repairs, fuel and oil, and general expense, including the different forms of taxation and automobile insurance.

The surveys made by the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, by the advertising agencies of the country, and by the research departments of the automobile companies, have made it possible to make a conservative estimate of the 1923 investment in automobiles.

Two and a half billions of the grand total will be spent for new passenger cars. The average price in forming the estimate, is placed at $1000. The surveys predict that 2,500,000 cars will be bought.

Following comes the item of used cars, and it is estimated that during the year 1,900,000 of these cars will be sold to new owners. The average price in the estimating is placed at $500. The total to be spent on used cars is placed at $950,000,000.

LOTS FOR TRUCKS

In the truck field it is estimated that $1,500,000,000 will be spent for vehicles of the motor transport division. This total includes the truck price and the replacement parts.

The necessary items of fuel and oil for these new cars, used cars and the other cars bought in former years but still going strong and healthy, must be included in the total expense. The conservative estimate places the year's gas bill for passenger cars at $1,950,000,000 and the year's oil bill at $750,000,000.

To purchase replacement parts for the cars sold during 1923 and for all other cars it is estimated that the total of $1,000,000,000 will be paid out over the counters to dealers, or to the garages and service stations.

What is left of the $10,000,000,000, or $1,350,000,000 will be taken care of by the repair men's bills, for accessories, or paid out for theft and fire and accident and other forms of insurance, and for driving licenses, owners' licenses, certificates of title, gas and road taxation and for plain ordinary form of taxation.

WILLARD COMPANY IMPROVES WARES

RESEARCH LABORTARY IS IMMENSE AFFAIR; CAPABLE MAN IN CHARGE

"It is not reasonable to suppose that Remington or Heinze or Eastman or any other manufacturer of a nationally known product, would go on year after year making their merchandise without endeavoring to improve it," said C. T. Holcomb, manager of the Western Auto Electric Company, distributor of Willard batteries. "It is commonly known that such concerns support research laboratories in connection with their factories.

On visiting the Willard Company's research laboratory, I was amazed at its magnitude. The laboratory itself is larger than many a factory. Department after department, each in charge of a highly trained man, often a graduate of a technical school, is under the direct supervision of T. A. Willard himself. Batteries representing new ideas in battery making are given the third degree turning motors in furnaces and in refrigerators at below zero temperatures, on bumping machines and on all sort of contraptions to simulate every kind of driving condition. Incidentally I was amused at their 'discarded' ideas; therein I recognized several 'features' which some of my acquaintances in the battery business are advocating as 'new.'"

IT WAS impossible for the members of our organization to give the thousands of persons who visited our store last week the personal attention that we expect them to render.

For those who were unable to get an opportunity to see the new models of 1923 Studebaker Sixes or obtain the detailed information they desired we will keep open house on Monday and Tuesday evenings of this week.

Last season over 1000 motorists in the city of Los Angeles who desired Studebakers were unable to have them because we had oversold our allotment.

There is a decided advantage in viewing the exhibit of new models now while a complete showing can be made of the entire line. A close inspection of Studebaker design and test of performance will give you a standard of valuation for the automobile market of today.

Deliveries of 1923 models are being made promptly as the shipments arrive. Studebaker has greatly increased production for this season.

We extend you a cordial invitation to see this showing of a complete line of complete cars.

ONE CYLINDER AMAZES CROWD

First Pierce-Arrow Hikes Up Fifth Avenue

Won Endurance Test in the Big Pan-American

Mayor Rylan Has Words of Praise for Driver

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 13.—Metropolitan traffic cops momentarily forgot their signals, motorists gazed on it in amazement and pedestrians craned their necks a few days ago when a little one-cylinder "horseless carriage" chugged down Fifth avenue in New York City.

The spunky, buggy-like conveyance was an old-time Motorette, the very first Pierce-Arrow. It was completing a repetition of the run it made twenty-one years ago when it came through with flying colors in the famous Pan-American endurance contest between New York and Buffalo. At the steering lever was the same driver who "raced" it on several of the endurance runs and contests which were the forerunners of the Glidden tours in which Pierce-Arrow cars won their spurs through repeated victories.

LAUDS DRIVER

It completed its journey in front of the New York City Hall, where Mayor Hylan congratulated the driver while hundreds watched. Alongside the little Motorette was a big, modern Pierce-Arrow inclosed-drive limousine. The contrast was startling.

One could step into the modern car and ride from the metropolis to Buffalo in fifteen hours or less, enjoying full comfort and complete protection from snow, cold, rain or wind.

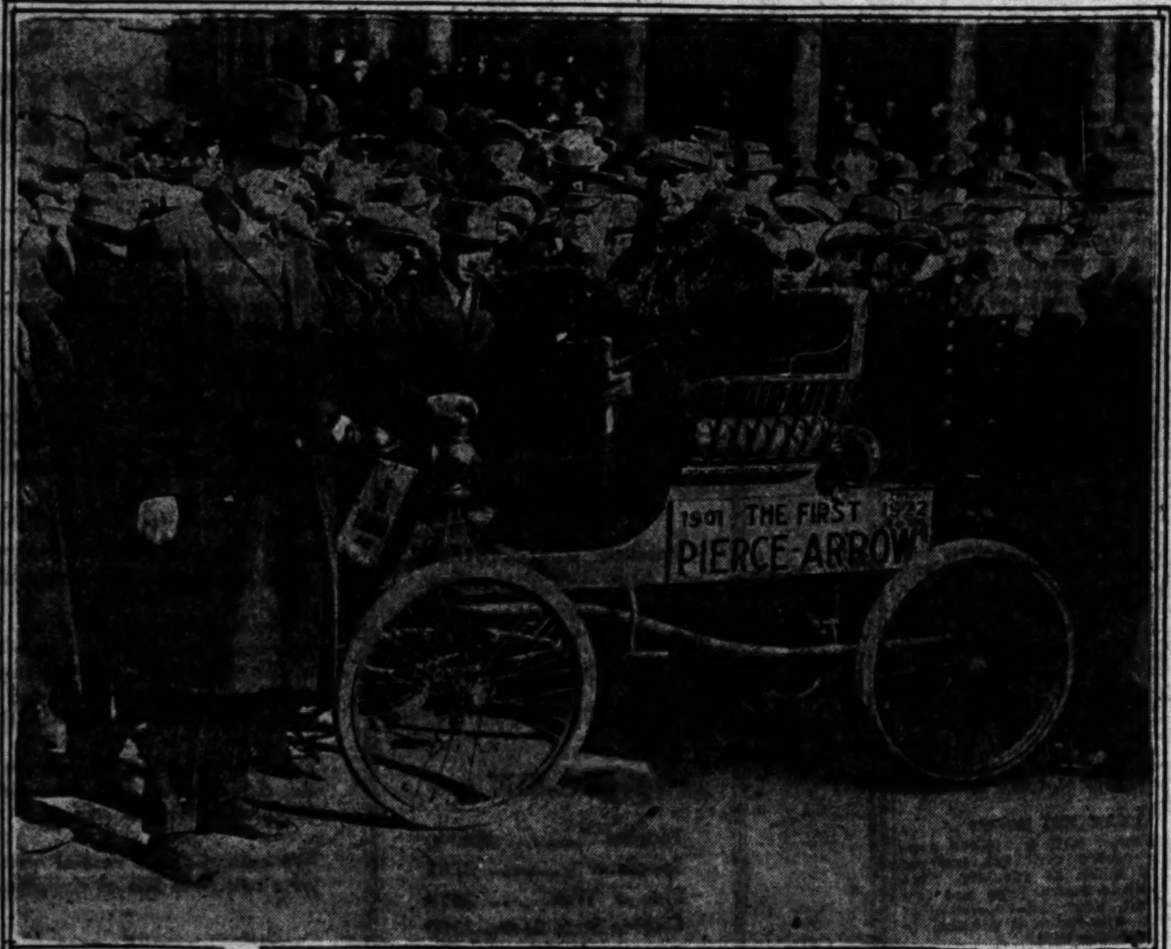
It took five days to make the same trip in the Motorette, and the driver had to be attired like an Eskimo. With no windshield, no top, no protection for the legs, he suffered discomfort even though bundled up in bearskins and wearing a helmet and goggles. Twenty miles an hour, the maximum speed for the Motorette, seemed like forty.

VELVET ROADS

Roads that seem like velvet in the modern Pierce-Arrow jounced and jarred the veteran car, with its short, 68-inch wheelbase and small bicycle tires. To turn around in cramped quarters, the driver had to jump out, lift up the front end of the 500-pound vehicle, and wheel it around like a wheelbarrow, for the early cars had no reverse gear.

"To see the Motorette beside a modern Pierce-Arrow shocks one into a realization of the really amazing strides that have been made in motor car design," says L. E. Corcoran, passenger car sales manager of the Pierce-Arrow Motor Car Company. "Today with its wonderful dual-valve, six-cylinder engine, and with de luxe coach work, the modern Pierce-Arrow offers comfortable, speedy transportation undreamed of twenty-one years ago."

Whoops, M' Dear, They're Off in a Cloud of Dust



This is the old original Pierce-Arrow, the daddy of 'em all. And the old boat can still ramble without goat glands, chugging along on one cylinder only recently all the way from New York to Buffalo, a repetition of its performance twenty years ago in the great American endurance run.

DORT BUILDS OWN BODIES

"The sturdiness of the Dort bodies is due in a large measure to the fact that the Dort Motor Car Company builds its own bodies," says F. A. Petrie, president of the Mission Motor Company.

Gold is first mentioned in the eleventh verse of the second chapter of Genesis, 4004 years before Christ.

DETAILS TAKEN CARE OF

Completeness of detail marks an achievement of fine design, and is one of the most sought-after points in connection with the construction of new-model cars. Practically every one of the 1923-model motor cars that have been received in Los Angeles, and just about all of them are here, evidence the desire of designers and builders to make their products as complete as possible.

Some have achieved better success than others, through correct proportioning, and some, because of intricacies of design, have been baffled and have met with nothing but failure in their attempts.

There is no question, according to automobile men, that the motorist today wants to buy everything possible at the same time he gets his new car, and not a little attention is being directed toward the new Haynes open and inclosed models because of the fact that the Haynes engineers have completely equipped their products with every known convenience to motoring.

This, according to J. A. Benell, general manager of the Los Angeles Haynes Company, distributor for Southern California for the Haynes line of cars, is one of the most successful attempts ever made to give the motorist everything that it is possible to get for a motor car. "A close inspection of the cars," Benell states, "reveals the fact that the Haynes factory, in releasing the new models, certainly lived up to their promise of producing a car for which there was nothing left to buy.

"On the sturdy chasses that have won international fame for Elwood Haynes and his corps of automobile men at the Kokomo factory, the 1923-model cars have been mounted and fitted with the extra equipment, such as windshield wiper, wings, motometer, bumpers front and rear, trunk kick-plates, spot light, complete instrument assembly on the dashboard, and many other features that appeal to the motorist who seeks mental and physical comfort while motoring through the dense downtown traffic or over the boundless highways, into the mountains or the valleys, that have brought thousands of people into California."

Mystery Hangs Over Departure of Local Agent

The air of mystery that has prevailed over the Apperson Motor Car Company, Southern California distributing factory branch of the Apperson Brothers Motor Company, was heightened last week with the departure of Harris M. Hanshue, manager of the local organization, for San Francisco and Northern California.

Hanshue's object was a tour over the dealer territory to last for several days, and it is expected that by the time he arrives in Los Angeles from the northern part of the State, he will have important news for the motoring public of Southern California.

It is believed that Hanshue's trip north is in line with the announced policy of the Apperson factory to revitalize and rebuild the entire merchandising organization, distributors and dealers for Apperson motor cars. Hanshue, in his position as sales chief of Apperson for the entire western territory of the United States, is making a canvass of the entire territory for the factory, and it is believed that many changes important to motorists will be announced upon his return.

AUTOMOTIVE OUTFIT SAVES A COLLAPSE

Motor trucks and auxiliary automotive equipment saved the United States from a big agricultural and industrial collapse last year, it is reported by national authorities.

"If the 2,600,000,000 tons transported by the railroads had not been supplemented by the 1,400,000,000 tons carried by automobile freighters agriculture would have been swamped and would have carried a considerable portion of industry into the mire with it," says O. R. Fuller, president of the White Auto Company, distributors of White Trucks.

The very fact that motor transportation has not been bound to any specific course but has been allowed the free and untrammeled run of the public highways, afforded it that flexibility of performance that saved the day for the transportation situation this last year.

Winter never fails to bring this car renewed praise.

It is because the starting system and carburetor seem to be almost immune from cold weather troubles. The response is prompt, even on the coldest mornings.

The cord tires, with their safety tread, are also particularly desirable in winter. They not only act as a safeguard against skidding, but greatly reduce the possibility of having to change tires under disagreeable weather conditions.

Close fitting curtains, which open with the doors, enable the owner to drive in comfort the whole year round.

The price is $1065 delivered.

According to an announcement from Breyer, both of these models are expected to be here within two weeks, and will be displayed immediately upon arrival. From the many requests for information that followed original announcements of the cars, it is expected that a rush of motorists will be on hand to greet the display.

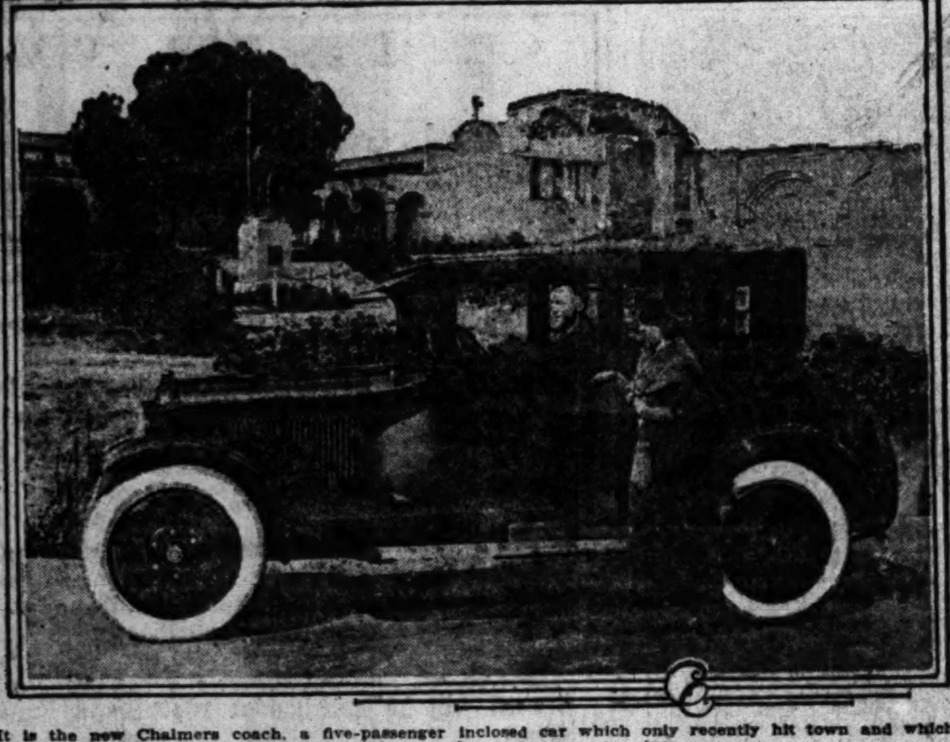
FOY DECLARES THAT 1923 WILL BE DANDY

Word from Byron C. Foy, who has been in New York to attend the big automobile show, indicates that 1923 will be the biggest automobile year that the industry has ever experienced.

He stated in a letter to his sales manager, H. E. Woodward, that Reo dealers from all parts of the country in attendance at the show were asking for increased allotments for the 1923 season.

According to Foy the metropolitan style of the new Reo phaeton has made it the most sought for model of the entire line.

This Is One That Has the Boys All Talking These Days



It is the new Chalmers coach, a five-passenger inclosed car which only recently hit town and which has been lining up the customers ever since.

NEW COACH ATTRACTS 'EM

The new Chalmers six coach, which has scored such a pronounced hit wherever it has been seen, is now arriving in such quantities that the Greer-Robbins Company, Chalmers distributors, is enabled to make prompt deliveries, according to R. O. Gould, retail Chalmers sales manager for the well-known concern.

"The announcement of this new model drew a great deal of attention from those interested in this style of inclosed car, and as soon as the first show car was placed upon our salesroom floor we had a flood of visitors desirous of inspecting it," he said. "The result was many orders placed for future delivery.

"The heavy demand for it from all parts of the country has taxed factory capacity in this particular department, while freight conditions have delayed shipments en route. However, we are now in such shape that we can take care of orders for the immediate present, at least."

The new Chalmers six coach is one of the finest jobs of its kind that has been shown here. It is not only beautiful, but practical, while in its dimensions it lives up to the traditions of thorough comfort. The entire body is several inches wider than other cars of the type, while the doors are unusually wide and massive. In every way there is ample room for driver and passengers—five in all. The upholstery is in broadcloth and the conveniences and luxuries are of the very latest practical type.

HOW TO RENEW A LICENSE

High - Powered Instructions on the Fine Art of Preparing for Motor Cops

The following instructions are issued by the Division of Motor Vehicles to owners of motor vehicles in making application for 1923 registration.

See to it now that you have a 1922 certificate of registration. If you have not, apply to the department for a duplicate.

If you have changed your address, forward your certificate to the department with the change of address noted thereon for correction.

If your certificate is illegible, send it to the department and you will receive a new one.

If there is a legal owner on the certificate whose claim has been satisfied, it will be necessary to have the legal owner sign as same on the back of the certificate to release his claim.

If a second-hand motor vehicle has been purchased, have a transfer made in the department at once and secure a certificate in your name.

If you have changed or altered the style of your vehicle to a different type, get a dismantling form from the Sheriff, police or other peace official and mail it to the department with your certificate and a new certificate will be issued.

Nonresident owners whose permit to operate in this State has expired, must apply at once for a California license.

All of this can be attended to at the branch offices in San Francisco, Oakland, Fresno, Los Angeles or San Diego or at the Sacramento office.

All persons who operate a motor vehicle must have an operator's license in their possession.

December Was Biggest Month of the Twelve

The closing month of 1922 registered a greater volume of business for Stanley W. Smith, Inc., Peerless eight distributor for Southern California, than for any preceding month since his concern has been handling the line in this territory, according to a statement made by him. With the exception of a five-passenger brougham, Christmas morning found the concern's stock of Peerless eights entirely depleted, due to holiday orders largely.

The following were Christmas deliveries: Mrs. Willis J. Hunt, Maj. W. L. Karnes, R. J. Leavitt, Mrs. L. H. Bentley, Mrs. A. R. Rutledge, Mrs. Elizabeth A. Jordan, A. A. Schneider, Dr. Frank Bishop, S. J. Chapman, J. M. Barteau, Dr. John W Cocke, Mrs. E. J. Brent, P. A. Quimby, Mrs. M. A. Bacon, Mrs. Mabel L. Gould, W. H. Beaudine.

"We made deliveries until Christmas morning," he said. "In one instance, we delivered a new Peerless eight inclosed job on the lawn of a certain home, and the recipient the wife of the donor, was awakened by the loud blowing of the car's horn under the window. The week before Christmas our servicing force was on the job at all hours."

DRIVERS OUGHT NOT LET OIL GET COLD

CANS GET CLOGGED UP IN FROSTY WEATHER AND NEED WARMING

Just to demonstrate by way of variety that all is not always sunshine and roses for the owner of a trusty Ford car, even in Southern California, J. Benjamin Fahy, local Lincoln and Ford distributor, tells how cold oil can get right here in Los Angeles.

He says a friend of his drove up to the house to spend Sunday and while the men folks were cruising about the place having a smoke and talking automobiles as usual, his friend bethought himself of a little lubrication duty he had overlooked.

He got out his hand-power oil can and attempted to feed the hungry joints about his car; but no oil flowed forth.

"Wonder what's jimmed that all up now?" he mused. "I know I had it filled yesterday."

"Better warm it up a bit," suggested Fahy.

And sure enough, after a few seconds' caress of the stimulating flames from the gas stove in the kitchen, the oil squirted out without any further trouble.

TO TEST GLARING LIGHTS

One Way to Avoid Trouble is to Let Somebody Take a Look

"An editorial appeared in an Oakland newspaper recently that has a deal of merit, but it fails to show that there is a remedy for the evil," says Robert W. Martland, secretary-manager of the California Automobile Trade Association.

The editorial refers to the evil of glaring headlights and says in part, 'Defective lights which are either too glaring or too dim, are blamed for the condition. The great majority of drivers will agree there is need for giving support to the highway patrolmen in the campaigns against defective lights.

"There is no one who drives at night who is not aware of the menace in improperly adjusted headlights. On the mountain grades this menace is greater.'

"If the officers of the State and city police would enforce the existing motor law, glaring headlights could be eliminated in a few months," continues Martland.

"The California Automobile Trade Association has established official headlight adjusting stations throughout the State. They are located so that they can be easily reached by motorists at all times.

"If the police officers and traffic men on the streets and highways would pick up those drivers who have bright lights on their cars that glare and send them to the adjusting stations, there would soon be an end to this menace of the road."

ECONOMY

in First and Final Cost

Judged by purchase price or upkeep cost the 1923 Gardner represents the greatest economy possible with truly efficient performance.

First, because it is a Four, with the lightness and simplicity of construction that mean small expense for fuel, oil, tires and repairs.

Second, because it is a car of balanced value, sturdily made throughout, with no unit slighted that another may be extravagantly built as a "talking point".

Third, because so many items of equipment that are "extras" on other cars in its price class are standard in the Gardner.

Yet in service the smooth five-bearing motor of the guaranteed Gardner, its improved clutch and braking system, its attractive lines and durable body finish, will give you a new respect for four-cylinder cars.

Let us demonstrate the 1923 Gardner. The story is best told on the road.

FORD PREDICTS BIG YEAR

Greatest Demand in History of Industry Forecast by Manufacturer

"The demand for automobiles during 1923 will be greater than during any other year in the history of the motor-car industry." This statement made by Edsel B. Ford, president of the Ford Motor Company, is based upon an analysis recently made in connection with the sales of Ford and Lincoln motor cars.

"But the race is going to the sure and not the swift," he added with a characteristic touch of caution. "It is to be a case of the survival of the fittest and the manufacturer who rushes in with a desire to get a lot of sales without consideration of what he gives in return for the owner's confidence placed in his product is not likely to find the year a success.

"The demand is coming from a more concentrated sales effort on the part of manufacturers and dealers. Even with all the cars now running there are hundreds of thousands of potential owners in all parts of the country who have yet to buy their first car.

"Dealers and manufacturers have been content to skim the cream off the top of the market and now are engaged in the business of trading rather than in the development of new car owners.

"But the change is on the way. We have sensed it for months at the Ford Motor Company both as it relates to Lincoln cars and to Fords.

"The great number of prospective owners are looking for their automobiles and the selling organization that is properly organized is planning to carry the story to them.

"All our efforts have been devoted to building better, to increasing the actual value offered in the products we build. Only upon such a basic and serious consideration can owner's or buyer's confidence be permanently maintained. When the natural reaction on the part of the buying public expresses itself in steadily increasing demand for a product the matter of price automatically takes care of itself.

"Recent price reductions on Ford products in the face of the heaviest demand we have ever known, came as the natural result of savings through constantly increasing production.

"When I say that the demand for cars during the year will be greater than ever before, I speak from facts compiled in an exhaustive study of car purchasing conditions throughout the entire country. The past two months, ordinarily termed months of low purchasing, have seen steadily increasing rather than diminishing orders, not from any one section, but from all parts of the country.

"Seasonal buying is on the decline. There have been too many times when the car buyer could not get delivery because he waited in placing his order, to warrant any further continuance of this disappointment inviting condition.

"So ordering cars is evening up. The automobile in this country is looked upon as a staple product, much like clothes or food. It is a necessity in modern methods of living. For this reason there is a large and virgin field of sales which is opening up to the dealer who is alive to the facts governing the case.

"We sense our sales field through a dealer organization of nearly 9000 units. The majority of these units feel that attitude toward cars of high price as well as cars of low price. From all over the country we are noticing a mounting interest in the Lincoln.

"Sales of cars of this type are not necessarily restricted to the centers of large population. Such a condition in the past has been brought about by the lack of facilities for bringing the purchase of such cars to the smaller localities. So in the quality car field, there is a large and undeveloped field of sales.

"In the sale of smaller cars many dealers have lost sight of the supplementary car sales where small cars, convenient to operate are being used as auxilary equipment by owners of large cars. There are many sales opportunities for every dealer in this particular class of business. This year will see many remarkable developments along these lines.

"Commercial car sales are certain to feel a stimulus as the buyers represented by our industrial and commercial enterprises gain confidence in certain types of commercial car equipment.

"Prophets of the law of diminishing return, who are constantly talking saturation point, seem to lack the true perspective which is that this country is one of such constantly enlarging opportunities that there will always be more business than can be taken care of. Public belief and confidence are the necessary factors in favor of increasing business. With these there can be no law of diminishing returns.

"We find certain of our larger cities where the population undergoes nearly a 100 per cent change every seven years. Where can the law of diminishing returns find a place in face of these conditions. The dealer is facing a steady turnover in customers coming almost as rapidly as he can adjust himself to the actual business in sight.

"Never before, in the history of the Ford Motor Company have we made such exhaustive preparation for business as we have been making in the past few months.

"We are urging our dealers to protect themselves and future owners against a real car shortage even in face of a daily production of 6000 cars which is our plan for 1923. And we know that we are justified in this warning for the demand is going to exceed these huge production figures.

"Certain manufacturers are going to feel this demand far more strongly than others. A survey after the first few months of the year will reveal that the demand is focusing itself on these makers who have most consistently bent their efforts toward the increasing of actual value in the product they sell."

GOOD FUEL IS A MONEY SAVER

AMATEUR DRIVER WITHOUT ANY PREPARATION SETS ECONOMY MARK

Our automobile engineers have repeatedly told us that the era of cheap transportation would arrive when the automobile motor was perfected. Now they tell us that that event has transpired. But Mr. Schaefer, sales manager of the Roseberg Oil Corporation, refiners of De Luxe gasoline, says that the fuel used has a large part to do with the economy of any car.

"We learned that Don Forker was intending to make a business trip to San Francisco over the week-end," says Mr. Shaefer, "so we persuaded him to drive up in his car, an Oakland, instead of going by rail. We wanted to prove to him that he could make the trip in a much more pleasant way and with much less expense by taking up the old bus. We loaded up the tank with De Luxe gasoline and he started out, keeping a careful log of the entire trip. Only fourteen and a half gallons were consumed—an average of twenty-nine and two-fifth miles per gallon. And now he returns with the enthusiastic offer of posting $500 that he can repeat."

COMPANY CHOOSES OFFICERS

Rickenbacker Motor Concern Elects All of Its Original Directors

According to word just received from Leon T. Shettler, local distributer for the Rickenbacker car, and who is now in the East, the Rickenbacker Motor Company's first annual shareholders' meeting was held January 2, at Detroit, Mich., the company's headquarters. All the original directors and officers were re-elected to the board, and all executives remain the same as from the inception of the business. These are:

Byron F. Everitt, president and general manager; E. V. Rickenbacker, vice-president and director of sales; H. L. Cunningham, secretary-treasurer; R. M. Hood, assistant general manager in charge of purchases; C. M. Tichener, factory manager, in charge of production, and E. R. Evans, chief engineer.

The report showed the concern to be in a flourishing condition and the prospects for the coming year most encouraging.

Not only has this new concern built 5000 motor cars, of such quality and satisfaction to users that orders now in for prompt shipment in the next ninety days—the three dull months of the year—greatly exceed the production schedule, but the company also showed a nice profit on its first year's business. So much so that the directors recently decided a five per cent dividend could easily be paid without impairing the necessary operating capital.

This, despite the fact that the company's plans contemplate trebling the output for the coming year.

DIFFERENCES IN OILS IMPORTANT

Do you know the difference between oil and oil? That question, devised by D. R. McBryde, proprietor of the McBryde lubricating service here, would be a puzzler to ninety-nine motorists out of a hundred, he declares.

McBryde grants that most car owners know how to drive, what to do when the tires become empty of air and the gas tank becomes empty of gas. But he insists that they really don't know how to lubricate their cars for the simple reason that they are not able to judge the relative values of oil and grease.

"The well being of the automobile," he declares, "demands more than a mere knowledge of the difference between new oil and used oil, between heavy oil and light. So the car owner must depend entirely upon the good advice and honesty of the man who sells these lubricants."

RADIO RECEIVED BY MOTOR CAR

The Times radio was received last Saturday night at Bakersfield, through a radio set on a Moon car, distributed in that city by Moore and Seefert, and was announced as a "Radio from the Moon." The Moon strutted its stuff in front of one of the city's principal hotels, where it attracted a great deal of attention.

The set on the Moon was composed of a three-foot antenna, fastened to the radiator of the car. The receiving set and magnavox, were in the rear part of the automobile. The dope from KHJ was received and trasmitted clearly and distinctly.

DORT TO HAVE NO CHANGES

New Six Cylinder to be Same This Year; Car Operates in Bath of Oil

No changes are planned for the new six-cylinder Dort as this car made its initial debut in November, and at that time the factory set its schedule of production on the six for the coming year, is what F. A. Petrie, president of the Mission Motor Car Company, says.

"Body lines were adopted and the perfect chassis and motor were put into production," states Petrie, "and no changes of any kind aside from minor improvements will be made in the Dort six for some time to come. The factory spent two years developing the new six and in bringing the novel oiling system of the motor up to its present stage of perfection.

"The new Dort motor virtually operates in a bath of oil, forced to every moving part and into every bearing surface. There is no possibility of any part running dry and shortening the life of the engine. The flow and pressure is regulated by the engine stresses. The amount of throttle applied to the car governs the amount of oil pressure. Heretofore it has been the idea that the speed of the engine should govern the flow of oil, but the most exhaustive tests have disproven that theory and set up the principle employed in the new Dort as being the logical one for efficient lubrication of internal-combustion motors."

CAR'S APPEARANCE JUDGED BY OWNER

It is generally acknowledged in the business world that the man of neat appearance and good presence is generally given consideration. Appearance gives an instant impression, no matter in what line you may search. A man is judged by his clothes, quite often, until it has proven that he has no other excellent qualities besides.

C. C. Eichenhofer, proprietor of the Atlas Auto Works, 1338 South Hope street, top manufacturers, adopts this line of reasoning to the appearance of the modern motor car. "I don't care what type of car you may own," states Eichenhofer, "whether its motor sings songs and its economy record for gasoline runs into high figures—if it is shabby in appearance, people judge the owner accordingly."

OTIS C. FRIEND NOW WITH LAVINE PEOPLE

Otis C. Friend, for many years president of the Mitchell Motor Car Company, at Racine, has become identified with the Lavine Gear Company, formerly of Racine, now located in Milwaukee. Mr. Friend will be directly in charge of passenger-car sales and for the time being will operate out of the Milwaukee office.

When both the Lavine Gear Company and the Mitchell Motor Car Company were operated in Racine, a marked intimacy developed between Mr. Friend and Mr. Herman A. Uihlein, president of the gear company.

SHOWS WELL ON LONG TRIP

Two hundred and eighty-nine miles a day for eight consecutive days, over roads that are none too good, is not a bad record for pleasure tourists who had no especial reason to be in a hurry and who would have gone slower had it been uncomfortable to keep up the pace. And yet that is the mileage established by Robert H. Craig, Jr., of Long Beach, when he and his wife returned from St. Louis whence they had journeyed in their Stabilator-equipped Ford coupe.

Mr. Craig thinks that the comfortable riding he enjoyed throughout the trip and the absence of any tire trouble is entirely due to the Watson Stabilators with which his car is outfitted, and in a letter recently received by H. R. Leonard of the Watson Stabilator Company says so with words of enthusiastic praise.

"Our eastern journey of 2528 miles over the Santa Fe Trail by way of the Grand Canyon was made in eleven days and was most enjoyable," he said. "However, it was on the return trip that the Watson Stabilators proved their mettle most conclusively. We left St. Louis on Saturday morning and arrived in Long Beach on Saturday evening, a week later. The last day's run of 325 miles from Needles over the desert was made in twelve hours. My car came through in fine shape and I had no tire trouble whatever. The high mileage we made proves conclusively to me that stabilators materially increase tire mileage.

"We outrode many a heavy car coming over the rough roads, and had people wondering how we did it. Upon arrival in Long Beach, neither my wife nor myself were fatigued."

Mr. Leonard is very proud of this unsolicated letter of appreciation from Mr. Craig.

"Mr. Craig's experience offers interesting and credible substantiation of all that we claim for stabilators," he said.

STUTZ SPEEDWAY FOUR

"The Stutz will continue to build the four-cylinder model to meet the demands of those who prefer a high-powered fast car that has utmost road ability, combined with the human equation of sport looks," says T. C. Whitcomb, general manager of the Stutz-Los Angeles Company.

KEEP CAR CLEAN AT LOW COST

Bridge - Bullock Overland Upkeep Plan Can't be Beaten Anywhere

The typewriter on which this story was written, is oiled, cleaned, adjusted, and kept in general good repair by an expert typewriter mechanic who calls regularly every thirty days, makes an inspection and does whatever is necessary to keep it in first-class running order, at a cost of $6 per year.

The Bridge-Bullock Overland upkeep plan about which this story is written, guarantees to keep every Overland purchased from this firm in good running order for one year for $35.

The only difference in the two cases is, that the typewriter man brings his service to the typewriter, while the automobile owner under ordinary conditions must take his car to the service department.

C. J. Bullock, president of Bridge-Bullock, Inc., local Willys-Knight and Overland dealers, who have inaugurated the Overland one-year upkeep idea, a flat rate of $35, says, "A great deal depends upon the driver. The secret lies in regularly conditioning the car, and that is the idea of the Overland upkeep plan. It insures the driver against negligence and carelessness in maintenance. His duty is to bring the car in once a month for inspection. He will then be told of anything that he should do to keep the car right, and his adjustments will be made without delay or further cost."

OLD-TIMES IN NEW POSITIONS

McVey is Named Manager of Big Organization

Col. Faneuf Assistant and Chief of Sales

Expert Automotive Salesmen Are on Job

The appointment of H. C. McVey, former manager of the Los Angeles Oakland Company, to be manager of the newly formed Durant-Steves Motors, Inc., was made yesterday by R. C. (Cliff) Durant upon his return to Los Angeles from New York, where he had been for a brief conference with his father, W. C. Durant.

McVey is well known in Los Angeles and Southern California, having been here with the motor-car industry for the past nine years. He has been associated with the Durant interests since 1908, when he first joined W. C. Durant in the development of the Buick, which was the foundation of the great General Motors Corporation which Durant conceived and developed from a single motor built by David Buick of Flint, Mich., in his back yard.

At the same time he announced the appointment of H. C. McVey as local manager for the new Durant distributing concern, the younger Durant also announced that he had selected Col. R. J. Faneuf to serve here as assistant manager and supervisor of sales. Col. Faneuf is well known here, although he has never been with the motor-car industry in this section of the State. Faneuf has been in the Northwest with the Durant interests and he has also been associated with R. C. Durant, C. M. Steves and A. L. Warmington at the factory at Oakland, where the Durant and Star cars are built for Pacific Coast distribution.

During the war, Col. Faneuf was stationed at Camp Kearney until he went over to France in command of his regiment, the famous One Hundred and Forty-third Field Artillery of the Fortieth Division. Faneuf will be remembered as commanding officer of that splendid regiment that visited Los Angeles in the spring of 1918, just before the Fortieth received orders to proceed to the Atlantic Coast for transport to the theater of operations.

After the signing of the armistice, Faneuf remained in the Army for almost a year and then retired from active service to become associated with R. C. Durant in the Chevrolet organization which young Durant then headed on the Pacific Coast. Faneuf was sent to New York, where he studied sales methods under W. C. Sills, Jerry Collins and Mike Lahey, and he returned to the Pacific Coast to be sent into the Northwest as a territorial policy supervisor. After the Durants left the General Motors organization and the new Durant organization was announced, Faneuf joined the new company along with the majority of the executives and was given the same territory for the new line.

After making an excellent record in the Northwest for the Durant line, Faneuf was brought to California to work under C. M. Steves at the factory in Oakland for a time, and when the new distributing concern opened its doors here, R. C. Durant assigned him to this territory in the capacity of sales manager and assistant to General Manager McVey.

Both Faneuf and McVey have many friends in this section and they will be pleased to learn of the new association of these veteran motor-car men with R. C. Durant and the Durant interests.

R. C. Durant first met McVey when he was a youngster barely 20 years of age. His father was then a motor-car magnate of the first rank and McVey was of his executives. McVey went through the development of the Buick and Chevrolet with W. C. Durant, and after serving as branch manager at Indianapolis and Atlanta for both the Buick and Chevrolet units of the General Motors, he was sent out to California in 1914 to become a factor in the development of the Oakland line which had then become a General Motors product. McVey stayed with the Oakland until he resigned as manager of the Los Angeles Oakland Company to rejoin Durant in his latest enterprise with the title of manager of the Los Angeles branch of the Durant-Steves Motors, Inc.

Already McVey and Faneuf have developed a strong sales organization. They have also strengthened the force of associate dealers throughout Los Angeles county and have an expert service squad ready to serve present Durant owners; and with such men as McVey and Faneuf at the helm here, the Durant line promises to score heavily during the coming season.

Col. R. J. Faneuf

New Officials
H. C. McVey and Col. R. J. Faneuf have just been appointed manager and assistant manager, respectively, of the Durant-Steves Company.

RATTLES CUT OUT BY HAND

Special Craftsmanship Can be Used to Eliminate the Funny Noises in Motor Car

There is hardly anything more distressing to the average car owner than rattles. A chance passenger in his car might not notice them, but, he himself, through long familiarity, can recognize in the general noise a dozen distinctively individual rattles and abominates each of them.

It seems a difficult matter for motor car manufacturers to quiet rattles entirely. That would be the supposition judging from their general prevalence. D. Gerard Chessman, however, manager of the H. J. Wurzburger Company, local distributors for Kissel cars, says that hand craftsmanship comes very near affecting this desirable result in the Kissel.

"Most pronounced chassis rattles are due to sideplay developing in the springs," he says. "Kissel prevents such rattles by equipping the front of both the front and rear springs with a specially designed spring hanger with an adjustable bearing. A simple turn of the adjustable nut by the owner quickly takes up all sideplay in the springs."

The elimination of looseness and rattles in the clutch and brake levers is accomplished by equipping them with hand-fitted, self-lubricating bronze graphite bushings, according to Chessman. These bronze graphite bushings are inserted at all working points in the Kissel that have a bearing surface exposed to a slow motion. "They make velvet-like cushions of silence," Chessman said.

SEVERAL NOTABLES ATTEND AUTO SHOW

Among the executives of the Olds Motor Works of Lansing, Mich., who are in New York for the twenty-third annual automobile show are: A. B. C. Hardy, president and general manager; Hugh Dunning, assistant general manager; Guy Peasley, general sales manager; Thomas O'Brien, assistant sales manager; E. J. Shassberger, advertising manager, and R. K. Jack, chief engineer.

Get Economy Out of High Priced Boat

It seems paradoxical to state that an automobile of the high-priced class and economy are possible in the same purchase of a motor car. Economy is rarely associated with high prices, especially in automotive products, despite the many lessons that "the best is the cheapest" taught daily to motorists.

Nevertheless, one of the most remarkable features of the new Duesenberg straight-eight models is a fact that surprises many who are constantly keeping in touch with the latest developments in the automotive world, namely, that high gasoline and oil mileages have been obtained in the straight-eight-cylinder motor in cars that have seen much service.

Pointing to the demonstrator that he has used, A. J. Shafer of Shafer-Harrigan-Cleveland, Inc., distributors for Southern California, declares that the car is upholding the record it attained in the 1922 Camp Curry economy run of better than twenty-one miles per gallon of gasoline, despite severe service around city traffic.

STAR SALE'S CREW BUSY

"The salesroom of the Star car is like a bee-hive with its crew of busy salesmen, and the days haven't enough hours to permit them to see all the prospects that they should rightly call one every day," says Walter M. Brown, vice-president of the Walter M. Brown Motors Inc.

INTERESTING FACTS

105,799 Ford Cars and Trucks Retailed in December

Approximately the same number scheduled for delivery this month

What Does This Mean?

This volume of deliveries to actual owners is entirely unprecedented for this time of the year—

It has taxed the manufacturing ability of the Ford plants working at full capacity—

It indicates a volume of business during the rapidly approaching months of "heavy demand" which will be far beyond the maximum production schedule which the Ford Motor Company has set—

And that means a Ford shortage even more acute than the one which existed last Spring and Summer.

Dealers' stocks all over the country are low—there are no reserves to draw upon to meet the demands for delivery—

There is no way in which dealer reserves can be built up, as deliveries have been made to customers as fast as Cars could be manufactured since last April.

The only way you can protect your desire to obtain prompt delivery of a Ford even at this time is to place your order immediately.

This emphasizes more strongly than anything we could possibly say the necessity of your making prompt arrangements with a Ford Dealer for the listing of your order, particularly if you are contemplating the purchase of a Ford Car or Truck for use this Spring or Summer.

We believe you are entitled to know these facts as they actually exist.

Announces Two New Developments Affecting Tire Business

ment has been made by the United States Rubber Company development of two remarkable new processes of rubber facture.

The rumors have d about the fact that large of rubber have been ar this country not in the form of crude rubber, the original liquid state in it comes from the trees. iscoveries are regarded as important developments rubber industry in many and are being scrutinized close attention by the rubber world.

of the new processes, Rubber World, mouth the rubber industry, says current issue:

the combined use of this and the latex-treated fab United States Rubber is in a position to make of a quality that sur by any product now known."

processes have been by the development de of the United States Rub pany, whose chemists and engineers have devoted concentration to this new method of extracting latex is mechanical chemical a nature here. It supplants the are in universal use on the whereby the particles in the latex are coagu by the introduction of chem the latex just after it taken from the tree, and supersedes the more ancient used in the jungles of Bra making the latex in the formed by burning uricuri

Though Rubber Company itself is modest in its claims regarding the superiority of the crude rubber coagulated in this way, other rubber experts do not hesitate to predict that the results obtained will completely revolutionize coagulating methods throughout the world and give to consumers rubber goods of a distinctly better quality.

Several coagulation plants of the new type are now in operation or in the course of construction by the United States Rubber Company, both in the United States and the Far East.

The new web-fabric process, in its immediate aspects, is of even greater interest to the rubber industry in this country than the coagulation process because most of the work of coagulation has been done at the source of crude-rubber supply in distant countries, whereas the use of latex—rubber in the liquid form in which it comes from the rubber tree — will introduce into American tire and rubber factories methods of manufacture that are entirely new.

The American manufacturer has been accustomed to receiving his crude rubber in the form of slabs and sheets, which are about as tough and dry as shoe leather. The first step in his process of manufacture has been to make this rubber soft and pliable enough to be worked. To bring this about he sends the crude rubber through a chain of machines, huge and powerful, which by sheer force rend and tear it and masticate it until it becomes a soft mass, a process necessarily harmful to the rubber. For some other purposes he makes a solution of the rubber by combining it with benzine.

In almost all so-called rubber articles of commerce, some sort of fabric—usually of cotton—is used to give body and strength to the article and in a large measure the wearing qualities of the article depend upon the construction of this fabric part.

In many articles, especially tires, it has been learned by experience that the more completely each strand of cotton can be covered or permeated by rubber the better the wearing qualities.

The chief faults with former methods of uniting the rubber with the cotton fabric have been due to the fact that it has been very difficult to force the rubber dought into the body of the cotton goods with sufficient success to do more than furnish a very superficial covering to the different strands and, on the other hand, to the fact that when rubber has been used in the form of a solution the effects of the chemicals have a harmful effect on the cotton.

The United States Rubber Company has found that if a thread of the fabric is immersed in rubber latex, the rubber penetrates to the very center of the strand. In fact, a microscopic examination of individual cotton fibres so treated shows that the rubber is present in the hollow tubular structure of many of the individual cotton fibres.

Threads so treated with rubber latex, whether individual or comprised in a knitted or woven fabric, have very great advantages over threads or woven fabrics treated by the processes heretofore in use, when associated with rubber in the vulcanizing operation.

The whole object of rubberizing the fabric is to cause a real union of the rubber and the fabric to occur in the vulcanizing process. When an article is in use, it rapidly begins to deteriorate when this union is broken. In the case of tires, the breaking of this union is called "separation" and is usually the initial stage of destruction, which proceeds rapidly from this point on. With threads treated with rubber latex, tests have shown that the union lasts very much longer than is the case with threads treated by the processes heretofore in use.

Machinery of extremely simple character has been developed by the United States Rubber Company for passing cords and fabrics through a latex bath.

"These two important developments," says the Indian Rubber World, "result in great advantages to both the plantations and the rubber manufacturers.

"From the plantations viewpoint, it means the simplification of the process of converting latex into crude rubber suitable for use by the rubber factory with possible saving over the present costs, and because of the absolute uniformity and high quality which the Hopkinson process gives it should mean greatly increased quality of the vulcanized article.

"To the rubber goods manufacturer these developments mean that the end he has so long sought—a pure, clean rubber of absolute uniformity and highest quality—has been attained."

One especially important phase of the discovery that rubber latex may be utilized in manufacture is the fact that thereby there is opened up a wide new field of experimentation which will almost certainly result in a great increase in the uses to which rubber may be put.

Handling rubber in liquid form in large quantities has meant many changes in the plantation work of the United States Rubber Company. Tank wagons are now in daily use. The latex is transported by tank cars to the nearest port and placed in storage tanks, later to be pumped into the tanks of steamers for shipment to the United States. Arriving in this country the latex is again pumped into railroad tank cars for transportation to the factories.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

AUTOMOBILE CLASS

A class in the use and care of the automobile will be opened January 26 by the extension division of the State University, with James W. Marsh of the University of California, Southern Branch, as instructor.

The course is a nontechnical one, without shop work, but all parts of the automobile are explained and demonstrated and instruction in the use and care of the entire machine given. The individual problems of the students will be considered and personal advice given.

The class meets every Friday evening, at 7 o'clock in room 814, Junion Orpheum Building. For further information or registration call at the office in the main corridor of the building, 815 South Hill street.

Visitors are welcome at the first meeting of the new class.

Question: Would you be so kind as to tell me, through your column in The Times, whether a master vibrator is of any special value on a Ford, and if they are how they make any difference. W. H. C.

Answer: Yes, I approve of the master vibrator and would advise anyone to equip their ignition system with one. The Ford ignition system differs from all other systems in that there is a separate vibrating coil unit for each cylinder. The value of the spark in each cylinder is probably different, as it is practically impossible for the layman to adjust the four coils alike. This causes the engine to work unevenly and frequently gives the jerkiness which is observed when the car is running at low speed in high. With a master vibrator there is only one adjustment to make, and the spark has the same value in each cylinder, thus a smoother and more economical operation of the engine.

Q.: What is meant by thermo-syphon system of water circulation? Is it a new idea? Can it be depended on to circulate the water? E. A. C.

A.: Thermo-syphon water circulation is not new, in fact, it is as old as water. When water is heated it expands, therefore, it gets lighter and as it gets lighter it rises. To prove this set a tall tin cup of water over a flame for a few moments, then remove the cup from the fire and feel of the outside of the cup, running the tip of the finger from the bottom to the top of the cup and note how much hotter the water is at the top than at the bottom. The hot water has circulated by heat. This is what takes place in the thermo-syphon system. The water enters the water jacket at a point low down, from the bottom of the radiator where the water is the coolest, in the water jacket it is rapidly heated and as its expands it flows out of the top of the water jacket into the radiator. Here it is cooled and the cool water flows to the bottom and back again through the water jacket. Some of the advantages of this system are the quick warming up of the engine on a cold morning, because the water does not flow until the engine is warm; the harder an engine works the faster the water circulates, whether the engine is running fast or slowly; there is no pump to leak and need repairing and the water will circulate at a temperature too high for a pump to work.

Q.: How high should the oil be carried in the Ford differential gears? S. D. A.

A.: According to factory instructions the axle housing bell should be about one-third full. Fill only until the oil can be touched with the tip of the finger when inserted through the filling hole. Inspect every thousand miles and clean out about every six months. Keep all screws and bolts tight.

Q.: Do you know a really good body polish? I know you recommend only water on a new car, but after the varnish begins to get dull what should be used? I will appreciate a suggestion from you through The Times. G. D. F.

A.: You are right, a new car should be washed with water only and wiped with a moist chamois. As a car becomes dull it is well to apply paraffin oil and rub down thoroughly with cheesecloth. If you wish to use something more I will recommend the following: one pint wood alcohol, two pints linseed oil (raw,) one pint acetic acid solution (5 per cent,) two ounces aque ammonia, two ounces spirits camphor, four ounces butter antimony, two ounces beeswax and two ounces turpentine.

Mix in the order named and give time between additions to thoroughly mix. The mixture should set for two or three days and be shaken occasionally before using. Wash the car well and after rubbing down with chamois, apply the polish on a soft cotton cloth pad. Polish only a small area at a time and rub until bright. Wipe and rub with a soft cloth.

Q.: How often should the electrolyte in a storage battery be changed? How can I tell when it needs changing? C. B. N.

A.: The electrolyte in a storage battery is never changed except when the battery is taken down for washing or other repair. Nothing but pure distilled water should ever be used in replacing the electrolyte loss. Sulphuric acid does not evaporate, it is only the water which is lost so nothing but water should be put in to replace that lost by evaporation.

EFFICIENCY IS SHOWN IN TEST

This seems to be the day and age of records and De Luxe gasoline has hung up another one, according to Mr. Shafer, sales manager for the Roseberg Oil Corporation, producers and refiners of this gasoline. He reports a run from Los Angeles to San Francisco by an amateur driver using his own car, in which only 14½ gallons of gasoline were consumed, making a remarkable average of 29 2-5 miles to the gallon.

Mr. Shafer says, "There are all kinds of economy runs and a professional economy driver can get mileage out of gasoline that the ordinary driver can not approximate. This run, however, was made by an "ordinary driver," Don Forker, using his own car, an Oakland six and DeLuxe gasoline and reflects what the average driver can actually do. The route followed was over the Ridge and up the Inland road. Conditions on most of the trip were anything but favorable, the first part being driven through heavy fog and mist and rain, and strong head winds were encountered between Modesto and Madera."

This record was not made under the auspices of the A. A. A. and is therefore not official, but realizing the broadcasting power of money, Mr. Forker has agreed to post $500 that he can repeat the performance.

SPEED BOAT HELPED BY UNION GASOLINE

Gar Wood came and saw and conquered. Yesterday completed the Detroit sportsman's appearance on the Pacific Coast when he broke the one mile Coast record and set an international salt water speed boat record for one mile. His time was 75.53 miles per hour. The trials were run in the Long Beach channel at San Pedro.

Union Oil officials are particularly pleased because Union gasoline was used and they feel they have reason to be proud of the fact that Western gasoline did its share to help the motor boat speed king set new high marks for the Pacific Coast sportsmen to shoot at.

Though States Rubber Company itself is modest in its claims regarding the superiority of the crude rubber coagulated in this way, other rubber experts do not hesitate to predict that the results obtained will completely revolutionize coagulating methods throughout the world and give to consumers rubber goods of a distinctly better quality.

Several coagulation plants of the new type are now in operation or in the course of construction by the United States Rubber Company, both in the United States and the Far East.

The new web-fabric process, in its immediate aspects, is of even greater interest to the rubber industry in this country than the coagulation process because most of the work of coagulation has been done at the source of crude-rubber supply in distant countries, whereas the use of latex—rubber in the liquid form in which it comes from the rubber tree — will introduce into American tire and rubber factories methods of manufacture that are entirely new.

The American manufacturer has been accustomed to receiving his crude rubber in the form of slabs and sheets, which are about as tough and dry as shoe leather. The first step in his process of manufacture has been to make this rubber soft and pliable enough to be worked. To bring this about he sends the crude rubber through a chain of machines, huge and powerful, which by sheer force rend and tear it and masticate it until it becomes a soft mass, a process necessarily harmful to the rubber. For some other purposes he makes a solution of the rubber by combining it with benzine.

In almost all so-called rubber articles of commerce, some sort of fabric—usually of cotton—is used to give body and strength to the article and in a large measure the wearing qualities of the article depend upon the construction of this fabric part.

In many articles, especially tires, it has been learned by experience that the more completely each strand of cotton can be covered or permeated by rubber the better the wearing qualities.

The chief faults with former methods of uniting the rubber with the cotton fabric have been due to the fact that it has been very difficult to force the rubber dought into the body of the cotton goods with sufficient success to do more than furnish a very superficial covering to the different strands and, on the other hand, to the fact that when rubber has been used in the form of a solution the effects of the chemicals have a harmful effect on the cotton.

The United States Rubber Company has found that if a thread of the fabric is immersed in rubber latex, the rubber penetrates to the very center of the strand. In fact, a microscopic examination of individual cotton fibres so treated shows that the rubber is present in the hollow tubular structure of many of the individual cotton fibres.

Threads so treated with rubber latex, whether individual or comprised in a knitted or woven fabric, have very great advantages over threads or woven fabrics treated by the processes heretofore in use, when associated with rubber in the vulcanizing operation.

The whole object of rubberizing the fabric is to cause a real union of the rubber and the fabric to occur in the vulcanizing process. TIRE PRICES ARE RAISED

Move Made to Protect Larger Producers From the Extensive Sale of "Gyp" Wares

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH]

AKRON (O.) Jan. 13.—That the large number of producers of "Gyp" tires will again become active and start flooding the tire market with cheap bargain tires is indicated in reports received from every section of the United States during the past week by leading producers of tires here. The new price levels which now obtain makes it possible for these producers to offer tires at considerable below the legitimate lists and they are preparing for an active season.

During the past year with prices extremely low the average automobile owner was reluctant to buy these unknown tires because the legitimate tires could be bought for almost the same price as the "Gyps," but the new prices will again make it possible for the "Gyp" producer to make inducements to get the autoist to take a change on getting a new tire at a very low price.

ARE PROTECTED

One of the reasons the larger producers delayed raising prices was to prevent this very action and the price increase acts as an umbrella under which this class of manufacturers are amply protected and can flourish, it is admitted by the industrial leaders here.

During the past week the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company and the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company have joined the other producers in raising tire prices, and the entire industry with the exception of one or two small producers is now at the new level.

The Goodyear advance amounted to from 7 to 12½ per cent while the Firestone company, in confirming the report that this company is also to advance, stated this week that the figures have not as yet been completed but that the new prices will probably be in line with those of the other companies.

TO BE RETROACTIVE

The Firestone company also announced that its prices will be retroactive to January 2, which even in lieu of a definite statement indicates that the dealers have been informed previously that they could expect an advance.

Announcements from all the companies in the district indicate that the advance in tire prices has not interfered with the sales in the least, while some of the leading sales managers seem to be of the opinion that the sales will be stimulated rather than curtailed because of the advance.

The advances were generally expected, and even with the increase tires are generally characterized as being lower than other products giving the same service.

BREATHE EASIER

Since Goodyear and Firestone have increased prices the entire industry has breathed easier and the tension which resulted from the failure of these large companies to go with the other manufacturers has disappeared.

It was generally believed that these companies would join in the general movement but the fact that they had not actually done so left the possibility of a new tire war, which was generally dreaded at the present time.

During the week the Goodyear officials informed the industrial assembly that the time is not propitious for an advance in wages and salaries. The assembly had demanded a 15 per cent increase by resolution.

Factory Manager Paul W. Litchfield explained present conditions to the assembly in a body and it is generally understood that the refusal of the company to meet the demands of the men will not result in any labor disturbance at the plant.

REFUSE CUT

The B. F. Goodrich Company was confronted with a small strike during the latter part of the previous week, due to a refusal of approximately 100 men to accept a wage cut which had been put through th entire factory.

Some builders and finishers walked out in sympathy but the company refused to deal with the strikers and conditions are now reported as very nearly normal by officials of the company.

President Harvey S. Firestone is making strenuous efforts to have the government support a movement to start production of crude rubber in the Philippine Islands due to the British and Dutch agreement to curtail production of crude.

COST A BUNCH

Firestone recently estimated that the increased crude rubber prices brought about by the passage of the Stevenson law by the British colonial government in the rubber zone will cost the American people more than $100,000,000 during the present year and that the time has come where American manufacturers must have an independent source of crude rubber.

The islands are well suited to the production of rubber, according to President Firestone. He has been in Washington during the past week making efforts to interest government officials in his project.

The fact that Firestone is on very intimate terms with President Harding leads to the opinion in the rubber center that his request will at least receive a hearing in those governmental quarters where the subject can be best studied.

The General Tire and Rubber Company has announced a change in stock par following the disbursement of a 100 per cent stock dividend. Under the new charter the par value of general common stock is $50 and following the dividend disbursement the holder of one share of $100 common now has four shares of $50 stock. The 6 per cent dividend on the common is equivalent to a net return of 12 per cent under the new arrangement.

Reports from all the factories indicate that the winter sales thus far are higher even than was anticipated and it is not unlikely that the first month of spring will find production even higher than during the past year when new unit production records were hung up in most of the important factories.

Statements obtained from all rubber leaders during the past week regarding the prospect for 1923 are filled with an optimism which has not been equaled since the early part of 1919.

CHANGES IN BLUE PRINT ARE MANY

Oakland Company Uses Thousands of Square Feet of Paper Each Year

Four hundred thousand square feet of blue print paper are used each year in the drafting departments of the Oakland Motor Car Company, Pontiac, Mich., or enough to paper the walls of more than 300 average sized homes. This paper is used by the drafting divisions of the designing, engineering and tool engineering departments.

The tremendous amount of details and records to be kept by the designing engineering department of a large automobile company may be gleaned from the fact that approximately 50,000 blue prints of the parts of the car are on file at the Oakland Motor Car Company.

Every time a change is made in the design of a part, fifteen new prints are made to replace the old prints and sent to the various departments in which the parts are manufactured. Change notices are likewise sent to each department.

Approximately twenty parts list books are kept on hand, giving the details of every part that goes into the car, subassembly parts and large unit assembly parts. Changes are made in these books, too, each time a change is made in any blue print.

Every change in design must first have the approval of the chief engineer before it is presented to the head of the company for final decision.

BIG PRODUCTION ASSISTS PRICES

RESULT OF TURNING OUT CARS IN QUANTITY IS CUT IN COST AND PRICE

The recent drop in Hupmobile prices and a renewed buying activity that is always in evidence following the beginning of a new year, have boosted the volume of sales of Hupmobiles to a very pronounced degree, according to a statement made by Billy Williams, retail Hupmobile sales manager of the Greer-Robbins Company, Hupmobile distributors for California.

"The announcement from Detroit that Hupmobile prices were cut on all models has stimulated sales very sharply," he declared. "The tremendous increase in the volume of sales—100 per cent in the past two years—and greatly increased production facilities, have brought about a saving in manufacturing costs that is passed on to the public. Instead of being absorbed in dividends, the public is given the opportunity to buy this popular car at a saving. Of course the high standards of Hup engineering practices, quality and manufacture, remain the same. From a small beginning in 1909, the Hupmobile has now advanced until it stands ninth in the number of cars sold."

GARDNER MACHINE THERE ON BEARINGS

Interesting things coincident to the arrival here recently of the new Gardner light four motor car, the only four-cylinder automobile with five main bearings on the crankshaft, were sort of pried out of William G. Fisher, sales manager of the McGill Motor Company, local distributors.

Russell E. Gardner, president of the Gardner Motor Company, with huge factories in St. Louis, Mo., has been in the vehicle building business for many years, entering the automobile end of the game when other modes of travel began to vanish as common carriers.

Since that time the company has risen from zero to sixteenth place in the list of automobile manufacturers in this country in the matter of production, and has jumped to eighth place in the statistical parade of builders of four-cylinder cars.

BROUGHAM POPULAR TYPE NOW

Official Name is Something Else but the Near-Sedan Type is Now Called This

The great popularity of the type of inclosed car which the public is calling a brougham, should bring about an official change in the name of this car, and the word brougham should be sanctioned as the correct name, according to Harry Lord of the Lord Motor Car Company, who reports sales on both Velie and Jordan brougham models as unusually brisk.

"The true brougham under the motor car nomenclature of past years," siad Lord, "was a car with permanently inclosed tonneau and having a driver's seat outside with no roof over it. But how often does one see this type of car today? A year or two ago, however, certain motor car manufacturers produced an inclosed car seating four or five passengers, having two doors and having a roomy luggage compartment at the rear. Being neither a sedan nor a coupe, the public began to call this car a brougham. The car sprang to instant popularity, and was everywhere called a brougham.

"When Edward S. Jordan produced a car of this type he frankly named it the Jordan Silhouette Brougham and this name appeared in the Jordan catalog. During 1922 this type of car became more and more popular, one maker after another producing a similar model, and naming it a brougham, so that now the motoring public is quite accustomed to calling this car a brougham.

"So, 1923 now finds the public and the motor car dealers and the manufacturers calling this car a brougham, while in the official nomenclature of the industry a brougham is not a brougham unless it has the driver's seat outside, with no roof over it. But eventually popular usage will force the change of this designation, and if eventually, why not now?"

Autosuggestion Doesn't Work in the Motor World

Emile Coue has created a sensation from one end of the world to the other.

His method of autosuggestion is, in the minds of hundreds of thousands, spreading wider and wider. There seems to be no limit as to its application.

But it won't work out in mechanical things, such as automobiles, unless its application is confined to an autosuggestion to the car owner, something in this form, according to C. A. Roesch, head of the Alemite Lubricator Company of California, Alemite distributors:

"Day by day, in every day, I make my car run better and better."

And the proper application to automobiles, Roesch stated, is by means of high-pressure lubrication, such as that furnished by the Alemite grease gun, declared by automotive engineers to be the simplest method of keeping working parts of the chassis in perfect working order constantly.

The way orders are piling up in the local Alemite headquarters would indicate that, Roesch said, "Day by day, in every way, factory production must be greater and greater."

Redlands Has One Auto to Four Persons

REDLANDS, Jan. 8.—A few years ago Redlands was all set up over having one automobile for about every eight or nine persons in the city. The latest figures show that every fourth person in Redlands owns an automobile now. Of course it is not quite so evenly divided as that for some families have enough cars to go clear around one for each member, for it is estimated that one car to every four people means a car to every family.

And in ten years the automobile industry here has grown until it is one of the most important in the city. Great buildings are given over to sales exclusively and there are dozen of automobile repair shops, oil and gasoline stations, tire shops, auto top shops and other by products of the growth of the industry.

A very fair sum of the city taxes now is also paid by the automobile owners the figures show.

WESLEY BROWN IS BACK HOME AGAIN

C. Wesley Brown of the Los Angeles Reo branch has just returned from an eastern trip made primarily to visit the Reo factory. Brown has been connected with the Reo line for a number of years and devotes his time to the promotion of speed wagon sales. On his visit to the factory he conferred with the production department and the body designers relative to types of bodies particularly adapted for use in Southern California.

The adaptability of the speed wagon chassis to so many lines of business has developed scores of body types and the Reo Company has a combination of bodies that fit all ordinary needs. It was with a view of developing new types that Brown went East.

COFFEE TRAILER IS A HIT IN LONDON

London has a motorised coffee stall that moves about from place to place taking advantage of the crowds, whether it be the races, a cricket match or a rowing contest.

The eating department is housed on a trailer chassis which is pulled by a Reo speed wagon, which also acts as tender, running back to the source of supply when more food is required.

In appearance the trailer is not unlike the well-known tamale stands that decorate North Main street every evening but the London caterer does not adhere to a set location for his business. With a number of these trailers he is able to distribute his coffee stalls at advantageous spots when a big crowd gathers for some interesting event.

Steve Nerney

Not content with being famous as the son-in-law of the first automobile dealer that Henry Ford ever had, Steve Nerney quit his father-in-law, Bill Hughson, to become a Ford and Lincoln dealer on his own hook and is now busily engaged in putting 'em out in Hollywood.

NEW FORD DEALER FOR WEST HOLLYWOOD

Stephen S. Nerney has just been appointed Ford dealer for the fast-growing West Hollywood district and will conduct the business under the firm name of Hollywood Auto Sales Company, temporarily located at 7513 Santa Monica Bouevard. A new building is now being erected for Mr. Nerney at Santa Monica Boulevard and Ogden Drive, which when finished promises to be one of the finest Ford agencies in Los Angeles.

As vice-president and general manager for the William L. Hughson Company, Mr. Nerney set up an enviable sales record in Los Angeles, in the sale of Ford products. This work together with his past experience, prompted the Ford Motor Company in selecting Mr. Nerney as their distributor for the West Hollywood section.

January Sales Open Up With Bigger Volume

"Contrary to every expectation, the month of January is opening up with bigger volume of sales than any previous month at the California Oakland Company, where H. E. Franklin states that they have sold better than a car a day at retail since January first.

"The advance notices about new models and price variations to be made public at the big national motor-car shows usually serves as the deterrent of sales," says Franklin. "People like to wait and see what is new and perhaps choose from among the recent creations something to drive, but as far as Oakland is concerned, we have not experienced any of this feeling.

"The 1923 Oaklands made their debut months ago, and the factory contemplates neither a radical change of construction, design or price. The new Oakland is all that anyone could ask for in a motor car, and it represents full value for the price asked."

SLOTTED RETAINER GREAT INVENTION

BATTERY ADJUNCT SEPARATES PLATES BUT LETS THE FLUID THROUGH

What is a "Slotted Retainer"? This question, according to A. J Tobey, dean of Los Angeles battery men and distributors of Philadelphia Diamond Grid Batteries in Southern California and Arizona, is frequently asked by car owners who have seen the recent advertising of the Philadelphia battery.

"The Philco Slotted Retainer," explains Mr. Tobey, "is unquestionably the greatest forward stride in battery construction in recent years, and, from the viewpoint of the motorist, one that is saving him countless dollars in conserving the life of his battery.

"The Philco retainer, which is an exclusive feature of Philadelphia batteries, is a thin, tough sheet of hard rubber, containing row after row of slots. The retainer is placed on either side of each positive plate against the active material, making, to all practical purposes, a solid wall which holds the active material firmly in place. At the same time these slots are so numerous and close together that they allow the free passage of acid and current

LARGE CARS AREN'T MOST SOUGHT AFTER

Mankind's ideas of beauty have always been more or less tangled up in size. Size, the magnificence of mere hugeness, somehow impresses us all out of proportion to its real esthetic value. It has been so ever since Cheops built his pyramid. Such is the contention of Hays B. Eckert of the Robt. P. Fite Corporation.

"The modern tendency seems to be away from that, though," he says. "Fineness of proportion is fast coming to be regarded as the ultimate test of beauty." Mr. Eckert believes that this trend of esthetic thought is very pronounced in the automotive field. He says that discriminating taste no longer demands that an automobile be as large as a freight car.

STAR CARS SELLING IN FINE SHAPE

Are Fifth on List at Present; Holding Up of Deliveries Cuts Sales

The prevalent idea that the five biggest sellers among motor cars were firmly entrenched in their positions in Los Angeles met with a setback last month when official registrations for the month were disclosed by the State Motor Vehicle Department, according to Walter M. Brown, vice-president of the Walter M. Brown Motors, Inc.

"I knew it was coming before it happened," said Brown, "but I was disappointed that we were not rated higher than fifth place for the month on our sales of Star cars. We actually sold enough of them to land us an easy third, but deliveries were held up and this cut down the registration of Star cars in the city of Los Angeles.

"Never before has a new car been placed on the market and in less than two months displace any member of the so-called big five. It remained for the Star to again set a new mark in the annals of motor history.

"But this achievement is but a mite compared with what we have in store ahead of us. The factory is getting into volume production, and with our dealer organization being rounded into shape, both in the city and in the county, I will be disappointed if we do not wake up some morning and find ourselves definitely lodged in second place."

Stutz Four is Still to be a Real Live One

The coming of the new Stutz six-cylinder motor car does not spell the demise of the famous four-cylinder Stutz model, according to T. C. Whitcomb, general manager for the Stutz-Los Angeles Company, and he has his information direct from the head of the Stutz Motor Car Corporation of America, Charles M. Schwab himself.

"The creation of the six-cylinder model to sell at a lower price than the four is the answer to the public demand for a high-grade six-cylinder car and a high-grade large four-cylinder car as well," says T. C. Whitcomb. "To continue the manufacture of the Speedway four Stutz, which has a definite place in the motor-car world, it was necessary to add another model to the line as a matter of economies in manufacture.

"The man who drives a Stutz today wants a car that has good red blood in its make-up. It takes a car like the Speedway Stutz to satisfy him. Stutz is the only manufacturer turning out such a car in America, and the high cost of the four-cylinder foreign cars makes them prohibitive for the American consumer. Hence he has only to buy a Stutz; and to meet this demand, Stutz fours will continue to be built."

"Outdoor" Franklin Did It

The Death Valley trip of "Outdoor" Franklin in his Buick demonstrated what could be accomplished in a heavily-loaded car when properly handled.

The "Going" was of the very worst—a trackless desert. Attention to every detail was essential. Failure to get through might have meant starvation and death.

"Outdoor" Franklin, as usual, chose Pennzoil because he knew it would give him maximum protection under all conditions.

GAS CHEATER TO BE CURBED

Short - Measure Employee Menace to Trade

Campaign Started to Check Growing Abuse

Offenders to be Arrested and Prosecuted

The cell door swings wide for the gasoline bootlegger. The nation-wide campaign of exposure and prosecution of the perpetrator of this practice, started by the National Motorists Association, has resulted in the clipping of his wings.

But, emboldened by the countless opportunities for delivering less gas than is paid for, and the difficulties in the way of detection, the short-measure gas artist is here and there exacting the toll of greed. This extortion may result at times from faulty machines, but not often, it is believed, the shortages being due to manipulations at the hands of dishonest employees and without the knowledge of the employers.

Co-operation between municipal authorities, owners of motor cars and the National Motorists' Association for the purpose of entirely eliminating this form of abuse has had good results. Not only has the spotlight of publicity been thrown upon the practice, but investigations have been conducted followed by prosecutions. Proprietors of filling stations, between which there is much competition due to the increasing number of them, can help in making certain of the honesty of those employed by them at the stations. Different ones of these have offered the National Motorists' Association assistance in breaking up the nefarious practice.

On this subject Fred H. Caley secretary of the National Motorists' Association, said:

"Our organization intends to keep up the war upon these perpetrators of sharp practice in trade. The press of the country has given valuable assistance through the broadcasting of statements from the National Motorists' Association, as to the prevalence of this practice, and municipal officers have worked with officers of our affiliated clubs in the making of investigations. In Louisville and Cleveland, particularly, for example, campaigns have been conducted and with good results.

"Using decoy cars, filling stations have been visited, purchases made and the latter measured immediately. In a recent raid in Cleveland, the second of the kind within a few months, out of twenty-seven tests made, short measure was shown in twenty-six. The shortage in some instances amounted to close to one gallon out of a five-gallon purchase. Results obtained several months ago from raids made in Louisville and other National Motorists' Association cities, while not showing as great shortages as in the one in Cleveland, were such as to emphasize the presence of the short measure practice.

"The automobile owner gets it coming and going. We are suggesting to our affiliated clubs that they redouble their efforts and relentlessly prosecute employees or proprietors of filling stations who continue to give short measure, taking care, however, that no injustice be done any innocent party."

CHEVROLET OWNER BUYS TENTH AUTO

That Chevrolets have a habit of running in the family seems to be indicated by Andrew F. Drydon of 312 West Avenue Sixty, who bought his tenth Chevrolet the other day. If they hadn't run for one reason or another it is probable that the family would have disowned them long ago.

As it is Mr. Drydon's prejudice speaks well for the car he continues to buy.

ANALYSIS OF SITUATION

"In spite of the fact that general business was far from the peak of prosperity, the year 1922 was the biggest in the history of the automobile business. The compilation of production figures for the year just ended show that it exceeded those of 1920, which heretofore represented the high mark for the automobile industry."

This was the declaration here last week of George R. Bury, vice-president of Earle C. Anthony, Inc., California Packard distributors. Mr. Bury returned last week from a visit to the Packard factory in Detroit, and gave an interesting analysis of the reasons why the automobile industry made such a remarkable showing in 1922. Mr. Bury's analysis carries weight through his familiarity with the industry, he having been connected with the Packard Motor Car Company in Detroit for fifteen years, resigning there as general sales manager a little over a year ago, to associate himself with Earle C. Anthony.

"When the general business slump hit the country the automobile industry was among the very foremost in recognizing that the public was no longer willing to pay for the extravagant inefficiencies that had crept into industry during the tremendously prosperous period during the war and immediately afterward.

"Therefore the leaders in the automobile business quickly began dropping their prices—almost in every instance far ahead of the period when their manufacturing costs justified price reductions. As they went along they discovered that by forcing themselves to do it their costs were rapidly pushed down by increased efficiency, until today automobile prices are lower than they have ever been before in history. This in spite of the fact that labor and material of all kinds is considerably higher than in the prewar period, which was the next lowest-priced period. These remarkable results have been attained purely and simply through efficient manufacturing and distribution.

"I was simply astounded at the progress along these lines made by the Packard factory. At the present time they are producing single-sixes, twins and trucks at the rate of approximately 2500 per month. This is about twice the monthly production during the best prewar period, and it is being done with a factory force of about one-half that employed during the former peak production periods. Prior to my trip I could not understand how the Packard factory could offer the wonderful value there is in their present cars at the existing prices. After the trip, the reason was obvious. In my opinion, industry as a whole could well imitate the example set by the automobile industry."

AMONG THE FANS.

Julius D'Orio, the Highgrove expert who recently achieved fame by publishing the "Mysteries of Dama," was in the city last week.

The local tourney for the club championship is now on. Sixteen players entered the tourney which will be conducted on the "double-knockout" style adopted at the fifth American tourney held in Boston. A player must be knocked out twice before being eliminated from the tourney.

The pairing of the players is by drawing and is done by a committee of three players who are not participants in the tourney. The drawing for the first round brought out the following: J. A. Drouillard vs. Anker Jensen, W. J. Nichols vs. C. B. Smalley, Fred Wright vs. W. L. Lundy, John Dougherty vs. M. L. Davis, J. L. Wilson vs. R. L. Wells, H. L. LeClere vs. John A. Hunter, John Morks vs. J. W. Spalding and R. W. Lewis vs. Ralph C. Lane.

W. R. Hogsdett of Kansas City, Mo., is here for the winter.

AN AMUSING INCIDENT

The following is an extract from a letter recently received from "our old college chum," Joe Reyburn:

"I have just come back from Imperial Valley. Fine down there. Had run-in with prohibition officer on my way back; too good to keep. Happened in this wise.

At a location near Palm Springs where Cochilla Valley narrows down to a point, the government keeps an officer to look out for whisky smugglers, contraband Chinese and anything else that is considered bad for you good people of Los Angeles. He gives all machines that go by a superficial inspection, but goes through all suspicious-looking outfits with a fine-toothed comb. Personally, I did not expect any attention as a Jew junk dealer and a boatload of Mexicans went by without any trouble, but there must have been something unusual about our old chariot, as he waved us to one side of the road, pulled out his little book and started to take down our life history.

After tiring of this pastime he started in to search the outfit from the ground up and soon dug up a mysterious package of six books, entitled "Mysteries of Dama." He saw that it was written in code, but was unable to decide whether same was Bolshevik literature or merely obscene stories, and my own explanation made him laugh. He next dug a little deeper into our bed roll and emerged triumphant with a bottle of Watkins' Liniment, shy the label. With the easy consciousness of a good day's work well done, he turned the bottle skyward and let a fair-sized nip of the pain-killer irrigate his interior. About a minute afterward, when he had regained his breath and could talk, he said: "My, God, man! Do you drink that stuff?" When I assured him that I merely used it to rub on and that a tablespoonful in a quart of water cured colic in a horse, he waved me to go ahead and he beat it for an irrigation ditch.

Ordinarily I do not believe in cruelty to animals, but this guy was so unnecessarily insulting that I would have liked to have seen him soaked in it. He was entirely too much like the policeman who arrested a man that stated emphatically that he hadn't been doing anything, the officer replying: "That's all right, old top, neither have I."

ROAD MAKERS WILL GATHER

Great Convention at Chicago This Week

Need for Uniform Action is to be Discussed

Great Program Scheduled for the Event

A movement likely to result in the enactment of uniform highway traffic regulation throughout the country is expected to develop at the approaching thirteenth American Good Roads Congress and fourteenth Good Roads Exposition, to be held the 15th and 19th inst. in Chicago, under the auspices of the American Road Builders' Association. This subject is agitating the entire field of highway transportation and development at present and the indications are that it will be brought to a head through a proposal by President T. J. Wasser of the roadbuilders' organization in his annual address Tuesday, January 16. Mr. Wasser will propose joint action by the American Road Builders' Association, the American Society of Automotive Engineers, the American Automobile Association, the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, the American Association of State Highway Officials and the United States Bureau of Public Roads and possibly other agencies, with a view to working out a solution of the question along national lines.

The subject of Mr. Wasser's address will be, "Highways—Their Use and Abuse." The road builders' president will discuss such questions as a more adequate width for roadways, marking roads with direction signs and numbers, gasoline filling stations, the billboard nuisance and uniform traffic rules and restrictions. At present, according to Mr. Wasser, each of the forty-eight states is operating its highways independently of the others and there is much conflict and confusion.

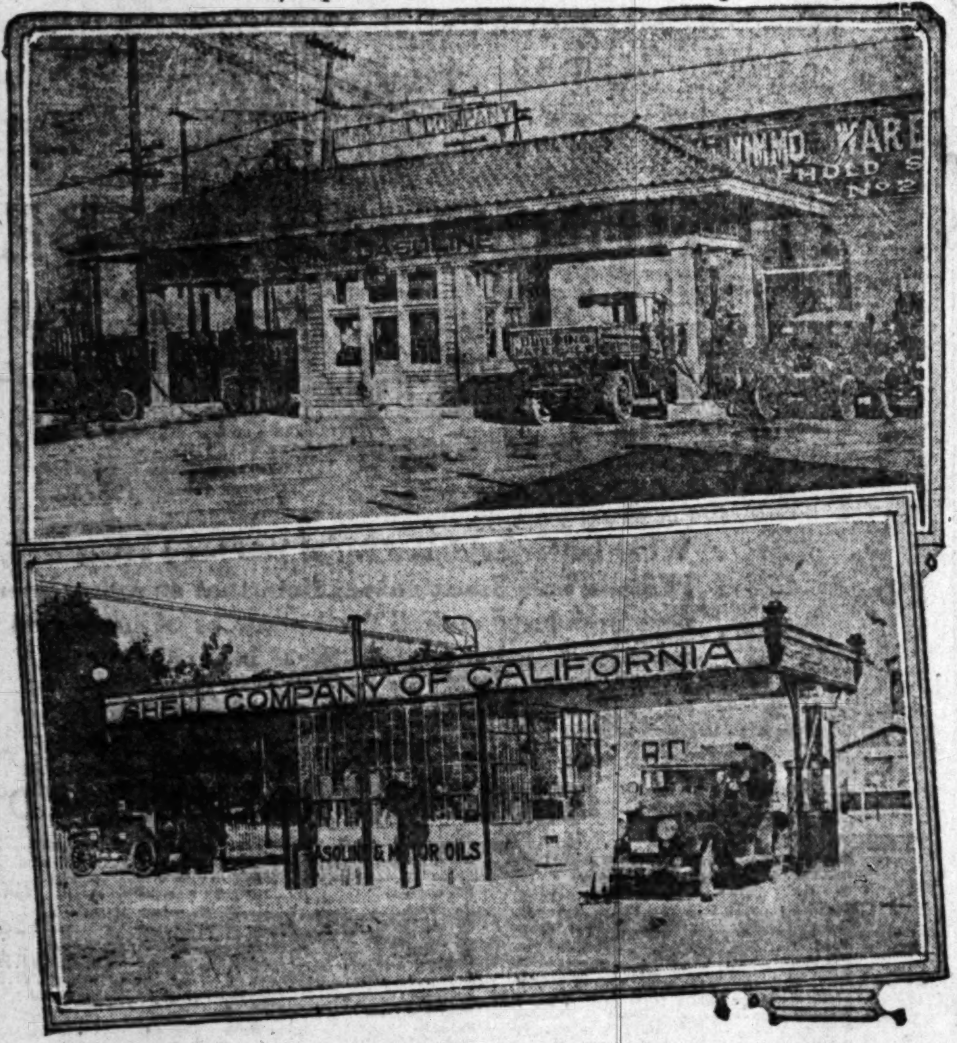
"I want the American Road Builders' Association," said he, "to take the leadership in promoting interstate co-operation in securing better and more uniform traffic regulations and I am sure that we can organize a movement at Chicago that will sweep the country."

Eighty-five thousand invitations to the coming good roads congress have been sent to State, county and city officials, highway contractors, engineers and good roads advocates generally. The Mayors of 5000 American and Canadian cities and 3000 county boards of commissioners, selectmen, supervisors or freeholders have each been asked to appoint five official delegates to the congress. Each exposition room has been applied for at the show to fill much more space than can be secured in the Chicago Coliseum and adjacent buildings. Excursion rates for the round trip to Chicago have been granted by all railroads.

During the congress, conventions will be held in Chicago by the Asphalt Association, the midwest section of the American Association of Engineers, the National Sand and Gravel Association, the National Crushed Stone Association, the Illinois Highway Contractors' Association and the Illinois Association of General Contractors.

The entertainment to be provided during the week for delegates and visitors will include a stag party to be given Tuesday night, January 16, by the exhibitors at the show, with orchestral music, songs, dances and boxing contests. On Wednesday evening, January 17, the annual banquet of the American Road Builders' Association will be held at the Congress Hotel. Men of national prominence will address the banquet and a high-class musical and vaudeville program will be rendered. On Thursday evening, January 18, the American Road Builders' Association will entertain delegates and visitors with a dinner party at Terrace Garden, during the performance of "The Terrace Garden Review."

Modern Equipment Adds to Their Popularity



Here are a couple of the service stations maintained locally by two well-known companies. They maintain that the Boyle-Dayton Aero pumps used in these stations are a great aid to efficiency.

CARS HAVE INDIVIDUAL VAGARIES

Buying an Auto Like Going to College; New Owner Has Much to Learn

Automobile manipulation developed to a fine art is comparatively rare, even among seasoned motorists, according to Don P. Smith, general manager of the W. P. Herbert Company, distributors of Cleveland and Chandler sixes, in this territory. Buying an automobile is much like going to college, for the automotive freshman starting out on a new course in his first motor car, begins to learn a lot of things he or she never knew before.

There are so many individual eccentricities characteristic in each car, even two cars of the identical making differing in operation, that it is hard even for the experienced motorist to perfect manipulation without continual practice and careful handling.

A knowledge of the motor of his car, the why's and wherefor's of each successive move should be indelibly fixed in his mind and practiced until the routine movements begin to become automatic, before the new driver comes down with an attak of overconfidence and fares forth half-schooled to possibly wreck his new car and put himself in the hospital.

Auburn Chugs Along Merrily in Its Dotage

With its two-cylinder engine tucked away under the front seat, and its gas tank and batteries under the hood, "Honest John" Spencer's Auburn beauty six today chugs merrily along the highways and byways of Portland, Or., an interesting survivor of the days when motor cars were still more or less of a novelty, according to an Auburn motorist from Oregon who drove in to say "Hello" to W. J. Burt.

The proud possessor of the finest and shiniest Auburn beauty six cannot be more attached to his car than Spencer is to his venerable chariot which was built in 1909. "He has a fund of interesting anecdotes relating to his car and its achievements with which to entertain you," said this Oregonian, "should you pine for amazing and truthful narrative.

"Here is one. During 1911 Spencer piloted his Auburn from Denver, Colo., to California, incidental to which drive was a stretch of 300 miles of blistering desert, encountered and crossed by the Auburn without a drop of water in the radiator! Most unusual, you may hold, but bear in mind that this Auburn is no unusual car, and that Mr. Spencer is universally called—where is is known—'Honest John.'

"While not by any means living in the past, he sometimes yearns for by-gone days—his first automobile license cost him but a dollar; last year it cost him over $20—which also is the number of miles his Auburn gets out of each gallon of gasoline."

TO MAKE CHANGES IN SIZES

Radical Innovations Announced in Wheels and Tires of Racing Cars

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH.]

AKRON (O.) Jan. 13.—Radical changes in the sizes of wheels and tires, as well as in piston displacement of engines for the speedway racing cars in 1923 were announced recently by E. Waldo Stein, racing representative of the Oldfield tire interests.

Stein left for his home in Los Angeles tonight after conferring with officials of his company here following a visit to the Detroit home of the Packard plant, which is building two new 122-inch racing cars for this season, and after visiting and conferring with Louis Chevrolet, Frontenac designer, and the Duesenberg brothers in Indianapolis, where new 122-inch jobs are being rushed through.

For 1923 speedway cars will be fitted with 30x5, 29x4½ or 28x4-inch wheels and tires. The smallest wheels now in use are thirty-two inches. The advice and suggestions of Harry A. Miller, Los Angeles master builder of racing motors, and "Cliff" Durant, had much to do with the adoption of the new size schedule.

Stein is also in receipt of a fund of information from European racing circles, which indicates that there will be quite an invasion of foreign cars and drivers to the United States with 122-inch motors for the summer racing season.

OILING SYSTEM TO REDUCE FRICTION

"The fundamental purpose of all lubricating systems is to reduce the friction loss of the bearings to a minimum with the lowest cost of lubrication and operation," says A. A. Derry, manager of the Los Angeles Motor Supply House, Inc., distributors of accessories and Veedol products.

"A bearing consists of two parts, the journal and the housing. For practical construction and renewal reasons, the housing is divided into several parts. These differ with design, but in all cases there are the bearing pieces or 'brass' which surround the journal and supply the bearing or sliding surface for the journal. The bearing pieces may either be of brass or babbit metal. Metallic friction between the journal and the bearing is reduced or eliminated by providing a film of lubricant between these relatively moving parts, and the degree of perfection of lubrication attained will depend on how low a frictional resistance can be obtained."

Special Tops Reachings Its Harvest Time

Harvest time for the builders of special tops, especially those which conveniently and completely inclose the open car, is rapidly approaching, according to Robert Thompson of the Robert Thompson Company, builders of special bodies and tailored tops.

The reason for this is easily adduced, says Mr. Thompson, when a survey of the closed-car situation is made. After the depression which obtained during the inevitable period of readjustment, which, according to Roger Babson, hit the manufacturing centers first and hardest, automotive manufacturers were exceptionally cautious in launching extensive activities.

The huge demand for closed cars that is now sweeping the country caught them a bit unawares and as a result they are not even yet able to produce these models fast enough. The most natural alternative in the world, is for a man who wants a closed car and can't get it, right when he wants it, is to go about fixing up his open car to meet his new requirements. That is where the top builders' harvest comes in.

STAR GAS TANK ON REAR

"Convenience plays a big part in the enjoyment that everyone gets out of his motor car and the ease with which the fuel supply can be replenished in a Star car adds to the joy of driving," says Walter M. Brown.

The Garden Beautiful in Southern California

INFORMATION BOTH PRACTICAL AND SCIENTIFIC. BY ERNEST BRAUNTON

A corner of the interesting flower show held at El Centro last month.

NOW is coming the time when complaints will be plentiful of mildew attacking roses. The best time to combat mildew is before it comes. Never was it more true that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure" than in the case of plants of any kind being attacked by this unsightly parasite. When the season is come to expect a visit from this unwelcome guest it is best to spray either with liquid or dust. Sulphur is the best deterrent agent; of cures there are none. You may stop more spores from developing upon the host, but the fungus plants already there will run their course. Except for the unsightly color of Bordeaux there is no question but it is good spraying material for all plants attacked by mildew. It is best, perhaps, to use it in any case, for the objectionable color does not long remain and its use is always effective. Dry sulphur should be atomized as much as possible, for what is needed is an extremely light coating. If there is a considerable quantity on the foliage and if the sun shines hotly, leaves will be burned. Sulphur is beneficial because the fumes kill the spores and mycelium of the minute parasitic plants, and heat alone will generate the fumes. Therefore the application of sulphur is of little avail in cold or wet weather.

El Centro's Flower Show

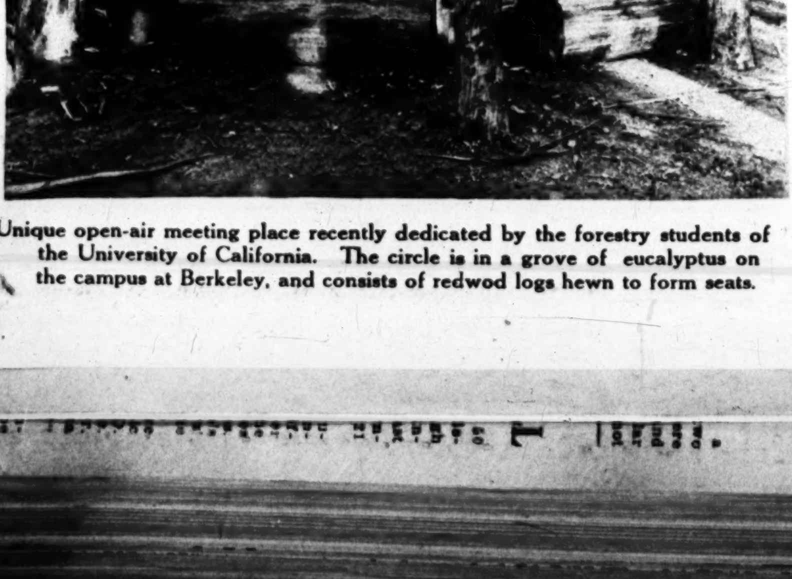
That Imperial Valley can grow flowers as well as crops in profusion and to perfection was proven by the exhibits at the flower show recently held at the El Centro Library. Miss Agnes Ferris, librarian, who suggested and arranged for the show, was assisted by a committee from the El Centro Women's Club. The display included roses, zenias, cosmos, chrysanthemums and was well arranged. The prize for the best juvenile exhibit was awarded to Margaret Hill. This was a collection of roses and chrysanthemums. First prize in the regular classes was awarded to Mrs. Harry G. Jones. Mrs. Charles E. Jones was given first prize for the best single flower, a yellow chrysanthemum of unusual size and beauty. The good attendance and the great interest displayed encouraged the officials to consider the advisability of making the El Centro Flower Show an annual event.

Killing Weeds in Paths

It is hard to kill Bermuda grass in paths and have it stay "killed" except some drastic treatment is given. It is best to get rid of all weeds in path or roadway and put the surface in proper shape and condition before applying anything to maintain a permanent surface. But a permanent surface is preferable to a shifting one and therefore nothing of reasonable cost gives more satisfaction than crude oil. It may be applied with a common watering pot with an ordinary rose spray, which usually comes with all such pots. Then sprinkle the entire surface with fine sand, very equally distributed and roll. If sufficient sand is used, no oil will stick to the roller. This treatment may be repeated several times if a permanent surface is needed. We have been watching some of the paths so treated for five years and the results are very pleasing if one does not object to the color. If it is desired to kill weeds only, there is no agency that does better work than a spray of white arsenic.

Commercial "Jimson" Weed

A "Garden Beautiful Reader" wishes to know if "jimson weed" is grown in California on a commercial scale and if the species growing wild in Southern California is the same that is cultivated for its leaf crop. The species grown commercially is Datura Stramonium; the one found throughout Southern California is generally Datura Medioloides, though the first-named is also occasionally met with. The difference may be only botanical; one may have as much medicinal value as the other. Some experiments have been made in harvesting the local wild crop and shipping it eastward, but we are unable to say if it was a profitable venture. There are parts of California where it grows in sufficient quantities in the wilds to make its harvesting an easy matter at a low cost per ton. Whether this would pay we are not sure, but during the late World War the "weed" was harvested. During the same period several hundred acres of "jimson weed," (properly Jamestown) were grown in Tulare county and other parts because of the cutting off of the European supply of drugs, but we understand that it is no longer grown commercially in California.



Unique open-air meeting place recently dedicated by the forestry students of the University of California. The circle is in a grove of eucalyptus on the campus at Berkeley, and consists of redwood logs hewn to form seats.

Some Pointers on Breeding Up Mongrel Flocks

FRUIT OF TREE AND HEN. BY HENRY W. KRUCKEBERG.

A. R. S. writes to this department for suggestions as to ways and means of "breeding up" a mixed flock of fowls, the object being to improve productiveness as well as uniformity.

As a general proposition there are but few mongrel flocks of fowls in California, the experience (covering a period of years) of breeders being that, from every point of view, the pure-breds are the most profitable. In cases, however, where the flock is of considerable size, and where conditions are not favorable for a radical change from the mixed flock to one of pure-breds, it is feasible and practical to breed up a miscellaneous lot of birds to a point where, in commercial values, they will prove quite as profitable as pure-breds. Such a process will appeal more to the general rancher with poultry as a side issue than to poultry farmers, because it can be done at little expense. If the mixed flock in type represents the American breeds, the method is to purchase a number of pure-bred cockerels of one of the American breeds. As an instance, let us assume that the mixed flock is suggestive of Barred Rock blood as a dominant factor. The mating, say, of a dozen cross-bred hens to a pure Rock cockerel will result in the "get" in something pretty good in the way of uniform size, shape and color. The following year select the best females of this cross and breed them again to pure-bred Barred Rock cockerels of the same blood lines and strains. Follow out this method for, say, four or five years, and one will establish what will nearly, though not fully, be the equal of pure-breds in all practical directions. One will not be justified, however, in selling breeding specimens as pure Barred Plymouth Rocks, nor will the birds, as a whole, meet the requirements of exhibitions, though there may be a good specimen now and then capable of getting into the ribbons. If the males are from a good laying strain, the hens will undoubtedly give good performances as layers, while for table purposes the quality ought to be of the best. It should be remembered that a "bred-up" flock will hardly yield much revenue from the sale of hatching eggs and breeding stock; and it should further be noted that it costs no more to maintain pure-breds than mixed flocks, and that invariably, all things considered, the former will be quite apt to prove the more profitable.

Hen and Tree Fruit

While it is true that commercial egg farms have been strongly in evidence for the past two decades, it is also true that fully 90 per cent of the total output of hen fruit in this country is the product of farm flocks, where fowls are a side issue rather than the main source of revenue. Thus, east of the Rocky Mountains, poultry culture is an integral part of a more-or-less diversified agriculture, which has an important economic significance from the fact that the birds largely "pick up" their own living. Where corn and wheat are dominant crops, this is quite feasible; in a region of fruit culture, its application is quite apt to be less general. But here, too, a flock of fowls can be made of decided advantage, even though somewhat limited in numbers. Every orchard and vineyard has more or less waste material (table scraps, cull vegetables and alfalfa stubble) that can be converted into money via the laying-hen route. Also in the establishment of fruit orchards and vineyards a flock of hens can be made a source of immediate income during the period when the trees and vines are coming into bearing. The cost of buildings need not be expensive, while the income from eggs and meat, in addition to what is consumed by the family, can be made quite a source of revenue. In addition the droppings as fertilizer for the growing vegetation is also a consideration. Our illustration gives a rather vivid idea of a combination of poultry culture and fruit culture, which is becoming quite common in all the valleys of the State, and more especially in the San Joaquin and Sacramento, where the shade of the fruit trees is an added advantage during the warm summer season.

An Inherited Ability

Tree fruit and hen fruit a winning combination.

The physical ability to lay eggs is inherited, but how many eggs a hen shall lay in a given time is not a matter of inheritance, but of the care given the hen structure by the caretaker. We are all interested in the Mendelian Laws of Inheritance and wish to profit by a knowledge of them in the everyday proceedings of breeders. These laws deal only with physical structure, and the only way a breeder for eggs can benefit by a knowledge of them is to breed for that structure which is known to be egg-making. It must be that Leghorns possess that structure; but not all pure-bred Leghorn hens lay equally well with the same caretaker. No two hen structures are exactly alike. It has been noticed by good breeders, for instance, that the length of the breast bone varies much, and that the long-breast bone varies much, and that the long breast-boned are the ones that lay. It looks reasonable that a long breast bone would aid the hen in laying the egg, there being less sagging of the adjacent organs, which have to return to place and use up vital powers. Probably it is one point for the breeder for eggs, that in culling the pullets he should select those of long breast bone for layers. This is selection, according to what we can see and feel. Environment's effect upon structure varies with the individual growth of the hen, but she will be able to breed only the structure which she inherited.

Mendle strengthened the old affirmative that like begets like. Natural law is imperative. The evolutionist must be right—that all that could be has been, all that can be is, and all that can be will be. Scientific research shows that physical structure dictates the future of the individual, which environment is able to vary and never fails to vary. It behooves breeders for eggs to examine the physical outer structure of good layers and become aware of what is a good expression outwardly. Only a biologist cares about the inwardness, and he will tell one that like inwardness always expresses in like outwardness in the very young, before a special environment specializes organic growth to an adult hen. The breeder for eggs should put the environment for egg laying early about young pullets, and keep it as even in all appointments as possible. The tiny pullets are future egg machines, and in order to grow the machines to a splendid maternity the environment must fit the running of the machine with mechanical niceness. The caretaker must house rightly, yard rightly, and supply hens pure feed and drink, according to the best-known practices. The caretaker who is a physicist, is a better judge of what had better be, because he has a different metaphysics from the one who ignores physics, so we are told.

Egg-laying is a maternal instinct, exaggerated for commercial purposes by avaricious humanity. Commerce and this special avarice are all right because only a present generation is being exploited. The most avaricious of our kind cannot tamper with hereditary transmission of physical character. Races go on in natural law as long as born to a fitting environment, and run out of existence only when born to an unfitness in the way of structural things.

RULING CUTS COSTS

According to Collector of Customs L. H. Schwaebe of San Pedro, the Fordney Tariff Act repealed the old law requiring vessels of thirty tons and less, engaged in conveying Mexican vegetables, to unload at the nearest American port, and consequently such vegetables can be brought direct to Los Angeles Harbor. This will mean a substantial reduction in transportation costs, as formerly Mexican-grown table produce was consigned to San Diego and conveyed to Los Angeles by rail.

Thoughtless Guests

UNCLE SAM was host to 1,500,000 visitors to the national forests of California last summer. Out of this number there were 750 who are known to have violated his hospitality by starting about three-fourths of the 1034 fires which occurred on his premises in 1922. This is made known by District Forester P. G. Redington, who states that "every one of these conflagrations could have been prevented if proper care had been exercised in the use of fire in the woods. A camp or brush fire, left unextinguished," he added, "a match or cigarette thoughtlessly tossed into the litter along the road or trail is a deadly menace to the forest. If we are to keep our mountains green and preserve California's greatest natural asset, the national forests, the public must take to heart the popular maxim—'Prevent Forest Fires; It Pays.'"

Fig Men to Meet

THE California Peach and Fig Growers, a co-operative association of some 8500 growers, with headquarters at Fresno, has set for itself the laudable task of winning the American market with quality figs. Fig growing is one of the oldest of horticultural activities. For several centuries Portugal led the world in the production of good figs and in the control of the fig markets. When that nation began to decline, supremacy in fig culture and commerce was wrested from it by the Greeks and Turks of Asia Minor. The producers and exporters of that region had things practically their own way until California entered the field. Quality, however, always wins in the course of time, and the superior fig of California, packed in a clean and sanitary way, has been making real inroads in the foreign market domination. The California fig growers, in fact, are optimistic to the point of believing that they can win the markets of this country almost entirely away from the Asia Minor producers by continuing to improve their product and by educating the American people to know the difference between the fine California fig and the cheaply produced and mediocre foreign fruit.

Next Friday and Saturday, at Merced, many fig growers of the State will meet to discuss their problems and to learn the newest and best in cultural methods. This annual fig institute is expected to attract growers from Southern California as well as from the San Joaquin Valley, where the fig has won such a foothold, and is undoubtedly one of the important horticultural meetings of the year. There are indications that parts of the Southland have been "passing up" a good thing by not paying more attention to fig growing and it is to be hoped that the south will be well represented at Merced. America is eating more figs than ever before in its history and is developing a taste for the fruit in many new and delectable forms. It would be folly, of course, to plant popular varieties of figs in localities not adapted to them, but those parts of Southern California which have been proven or can be proven to be suitable to fig culture may well have a thought to securing their share of the prosperity that may come from the expansion of the market for American-grown figs.

The character of the soil should not be placed above the desirability of location when a Southern California homesite is to be purchased, yet when sandy loam soil is combined with a suitable location, the suburbanite receives double value for his money.

VITICULTURE—AN INDUSTRY THAT WOULDN'T DIE A "NATURAL DEATH"

BY GEORGE LAW

FROM the days of the padres to the present the cultivation of the grape has been one of the foremost industries of California. In fact if the whole century and a half of California's settlement and development be taken into consideration, it might be said that the grape has contributed more to the region's perennial prosperity than has any other product of the soil. From the early mission vineyards the profitable and pleasant business of grape-growing, accompanied by wine-making and later supplemented by the raisin industry, spread far and wide into every inhabited section of the new Pacific Coast domain. Most of the great fruit area of the present the rich acreage now in oranges, walnuts, avocados and the many varieties of deciduous fruits, served apprenticeship as vineyards. But notwithstanding the supplanting of the vineyards, by cities and towns as well as by orchards, the grape has more than held its own. The industry has grown continually until now it is conducted in every county in California except four, a good million tons being produced annually, and the three forms of the industry contribute a total of about $65,000,000 to the yearly income of the State.

Although the Southland was the original grape section of California, the bulk of the industry moved northward. Fresno county now produces about one-half the crop, most of the grapes there being of the raisin type; San Joaquin county ranks next with a production of about 125,000 tons; while the six southernmost counties together contribute somewhat less than 70,000 tons, the most coming from San Bernardino county and the least from Orange county. The Southland crop has always been used mainly for wine-making.

California's peculiar prominence in the grape industry is owing entirely to the perfect adaptation of the climate and soil to the growing of European varieties. It was early perceived that the Pacific Coast region possessed certain characteristics in common with the Mediterranean countries, and might therefore gain for the mere taking the benefits of two thousand years or more of the selective propagation of the finest varieties of grapes known to the world. The possibilities of the grape in California were suggested to the padres by the presence of great quantities of rankly growing wild grape vines. These may be seen today in widely separated localities, from the ravines and stream courses near the coast to the remote depths of mountain canyons bordering the desert. But the wild grapes are small and sour and hardly worth picking except for jelly-making.

The black mission grape, a species of vitis vinifera not exactly determined, was undoubtedly the first exotic to be planted in California. The mother vineyard, supposed at one time to have had 50,000 vines, is at the old San Gabriel Mission. It is possible that the few vines now remaining are nearly 150 years old. The padres made their own wines for sacramental and beverage purposes; indeed, the mission vineyards, together with their herds of cattle, provided California with its first products for exportation.

A century ago, as, curiously enough, today, the growing of grapes was considered about the most profitable and promising ranching enterprise that could be undertaken. Cattle raising and grape growing were the most important industries of that day. Nearly every new settler that came in got into one or both of those businesses.

SOME EARLY PAINTINGS

In 1829 a Frenchman planted the famous Aliso vineyard of Los Angeles, 104 acres in the region between the plaza and the river. The name was derived from the huge sprawling sycamore tree, called aliso in local Spanish, in whose shade he built his wine vats and cellars. From his house to the river extended a grape arbor, ten feet wide and a quarter mile long.

In the '50's there were one hundred or more vineyards in the vicinity of Los Angeles, a great number being within the city precincts. The country east of Main street was a solid mass of grape vines from north of the plaza to as far south as the present Ninth street, with but one narrow lane, San Pedro street, passing through it. Early table grapes brought $25 per hundred pounds in those days, San Francisco being the chief market. In '57 Gen. Banning shipped from San Pedro to the northern city more than 20,000 crates, each averaging forty-five pounds. But this lucrative business encouraged ranchers farther north to set out vineyards, with the result that San Francisco soon began to be supplied from nearer sources.

The cutting off of the Southland table grape trade stimulated wine-making. By '57 a number of wineries were operating. Vignes, the Aliso vineyardist, was boasting of wines twenty years old. In that same year the town of Anaheim was founded, in the ambitious hope of making it the center of the largest vineyard and winery in the world. With the viniferous grapes of Europe, dozens of varieties of which were imported during these years, came over to California the European tradition of using wines as a normal and daily beverage. The wines sold very cheap in Los Angeles and wine was included free of charge in the fare at the hotels and eating-houses.

The wine-making process of the early days was most interesting, if not encouraging to the use of the product. The grapes were dumped into elevated vats, where all through the hot day crews of Indians were employed to stamp out the juice with their bare feet.

THEN THE RAISIN

Along with the growth of the wine and brandy industry and the state-wide table-grape industry, there soon came that of raisin grapes, flourishing best in the central valleys north of the Tehachepi. The wine or juice grape is still the most extensively grown of the three kinds. The State's vintage runs about 50 per cent to viniferous grapes, 30 per cent to raisin grapes and 20 per cent to table grapes.

As in the wine grapes California enjoys the tremendous advantage of being perfectly suited in climate and soil to the production of the raisin type. The native American grapes, the Concord and other va-

WAS PERRIS VALLEY'S "HUNCH" ON COTTON A GOOD ONE AFTER ALL?

BY H. V. HARTSHORN

PERRIS.—The world was crying for cotton in 1920, and was developing new sources of supply. Stocks were low, prices were high; the business world expected Europe to suddenly begin buying, to replace her lost textile stocks. It looked as though the South, because of the ravages of the boll weevil, had reached her limit as a cotton-producing area. Arizona, the Imperial, Palo Verde and San Joaquin valleys, all were caught in the great cotton boom.

Under these conditions the first Perris Valley cotton crop was grown. It had long been known that cotton would grow in this part of Riverside county. In 1918 a few rows of dry farm cotton were grown twelve miles south of the town of Perris by Al Wickerd, and the product was displayed in the Perris exhibit at the Southern California Fair. Some years before that a half-acre of irrigated cotton was produced by J. W. Lowery on the farm of the old Indian school, five miles north of the town. These experiments had indicated that the staple could be successfully produced in the valley.

In the spring of 1920, through the Chamber of Commerce and the Farm Bureau, a movement for the extensive planting of Durango cotton was inaugurated. The high price brought by this variety of cotton, at one time 40 cents per pound, was the incentive which led to its choice, though at the time old cotton growers from the South were emphatic in saying that short staple, such as Mebane, would be more successful. Interest in the new venture was general, and that year about 900 acres were planted. The Perris-Valley Cotton Growers' Association was organized and a new and modern two-stand gin was bought and housed in a good corrugated steel building, suitably located on a siding of the Santa Fe Railroad.

THE COTTON SLUMP

The crop was surprisingly good for the first year's experience with what to most of the farmers growing it was an entirely new crop. That fall and winter 385 bales were ginned. But then the bottom fell out of the cotton market. The world began to realize that a bankrupt Europe could not buy high-priced cotton. Quotations fell to 10 cents per pound. The cotton had cost twice that to produce. The association had to levy an assessment to pay expenses. Some who had joined refused to pay and the thing got into the courts. Cotton was not popular in Perris during the winter of 1920-1921, nor was anyone who had been instrumental in introducing its culture.

But at this time the new industry was saved by the energy of one man, who deserves well of the valley. E. C. Talbot was a well-liked and progressive farmer. He realized that the valley could not profitably grow any of the crops which it had been cultivating, and that was actually going backward. Cotton was the sole hope, aside from dairying and stock-raising. The season of 1920-1921 should have been no criterion of its availability, as the South, Arizona and the Imperial Valley had all lost just as heavily as Perris. In season and out, he urged that the farmers stick to the experiment, and, as an earnest of his belief in it, he himself put in a heavy acreage. In all, including his planting, which was a large proportion of the total, about 300 acres were planted in the valley in 1921.

But still misfortune dogged the steps of the cotton growers. At just the critical time during the growing season, when Mr. Talbot was urgently needed as adviser to the planters, some of whom were growing cotton for the first time, he was stricken ill and had to be taken to the hospital. His planting was, of course, neglected, missing its needed irrigation and cultivation. When Mr. Talbot was able to drag himself around, he had on his hands the problem of getting the small crop of the valley picked and marketed. All that was produced, including a small amount that was brought in from the outside to be

INYO'S FIRST YEAR OF TESTING CLOSES

BISHOP.—Inyo county's first cow-testing year came to a close with a program at the Pinon clubrooms, Bishop, Saturday afternoon, December 30. Dr. J. J. Frey of the State Department of Agriculture was present and addressed a goodly number of dairymen. Earl Sturgis, manager of the famous Fred Hartsook Ranch at Lankershim, was another outside speaker.

The meeting opened with a discussion on feeding problems by the dairymen. S. E. Matlick, who had the high herd average of 367 pounds of butter fat per cow, stated that he fed his five cows equal parts of oats and barley to the amount of eight pounds per cow per day and in addition about fifteen pounds of good alfalfa hay. E. Sluithers, with the second highest herd average, (335 pounds butter-fat average for seventeen cows) fed nothing but alfalfa, having no silo and feeding no grain.

Dr. Frey gave an interesting talk on the production and marketing of butter fat. He stated that a cow had to produce 200 pounds of butter fat at 45 cents a pound, or 180 pounds at 50 cents a pound to pay for her feed alone. To make good butter, he said, it was necessary to make good wholesome cream on the farm. He brought out that it took as much hay to produce two pounds of beef as it took to produce one pound of butter fat, and that while beef was selling at 7½ cents or 15 cents for two pounds, butter fat was selling at 50 to 52 cents per pound.

County Agent Hertel showed what continued testing had done for other dairy sections, citing examples of gains in production in Humboldt, Los Angeles and Kings counties. Had a test association been started here five years ago, he said, there would probably be an average production of about 300 pounds of fat per cow instead of 218 as averaged last year.

Following are some of the herds producing above the average production for the testing year: S. E. Matlick, five cows, 367 pounds butter-fat average; E. Sluithers, seventeen cows, 335.4 pounds; C. W. Matlick, six cows, 324.4 pounds; Geo. Tweedy, four cows, 323.1 pounds; W. A. Trickey, five cows, 322.5 pounds; D. W. Pitman, four cows, 304.5 pounds; Joe Bell, twelve cows, 278.5 pounds; Ed Matlick, nine cows, 262.1 pounds; Yandell Rowan, twenty-three cows, 259.5 pounds.

Al Matlick, president of the Inyo Creamery, presented cups to S. E. Matlick, for the highest average between five and ten cows, to E. Sluithers for the highest average between ten and twenty cows and to Yandell Rowan for the highest average for more than twenty cows. The latter had a butter-fat average of 259.5 pounds for twenty-three cows. Mr. Sluithers received a cup for the highest production for a grade cow and S. E. Matlick a similar cup for the highest production for a pure-bred cow. The creameryman urged more and better dairying that will increase butter-fat production and thereby cut down the overhead in the cost of making butter and pay the dairyman a better price. County Agent Hertel stated how the cow-testing committee had decided to give three cups for herd production and two for individual cow productions in 1923 and that, in addition, the committee thought it well to give a cup next year also to the herd which makes the highest average gain over its own record for 1922. Charles Collins, Sheriff-elect, volunteered to give a cup for such a prize next year.

E. M. Nordyke, president of the County Farm Bureau, gave certificates of production from the bureau for all cows making over 400 pounds of butter fat and for heifers making over 300 pounds of butter fat. Two such certificates were presented to S. E. Matlick and one to each of the following: E. Sluithers, Joe Bell and C. W. Matlick. W. J. Tinder, chairman of the cow-testing committee, presided at the meeting.

DOWN-TO-DATE REPORTS FROM TIMES CORRESPONDENTS.

EL CENTRO.—Soil fertility, standardized leases, improved housing, orderly marketing and colonization will be among the subjects to be studied at the coming convention of Imperial Valley land owners to be held here on January 24-25-26. The program committee has secured able speakers and round-table discussions will follow each address. The convention will have the support of the University Extension Service, the Farm Bureau, the dairy interests, the valley bankers and the Chamber of Commerce.

OFFICE IS VACANT

VISALIA.—The office of Tulare County Plant Pathologist, held for the past three years by Dr. P. A. Bonquet, was recently declared vacant by the County Board of Supervisors, the vacancy becoming effective the first of this year. The action of the board puts an end to a state of friction existing for a long time between Dr. Bouquet's friends and supporters on the one hand and factions opposed to him on the other. There was no charge of incompetency against the official.

IN WINTER PASTURE

CALIPATRIA.—A recert report to the Imperial County Board of Supervisors, filed by the County Veterinarian, discloses the fact that during the month of November 6099 head of cattle were shipped into the valley from outside points for feeding, nearly all being placed on the rich pasture lands of the north end. The number would be largely increased, according to the county official, but for the fact that good pasture land is scarce. Winter feeding of cattle from the ranges of Arizona and New Mexico is developing into an important business and many of the farmers in the vicinity of Calipatria and Niland are enlarging their alfalfa fields to meet the constantly increasing demand for pasture.

TO DISCUSS NEMATODE

FRESNO.—New ways of meeting the menace of the nematode, which is attacking fig trees in some sections of California, will be discussed at the annual Fig Institute of the California Peach and Fig Growers, to be held at Merced, January 19 and 20. Particular attention will be given the use of nematode-resisting root stock. This discussion will be lead by G. P. Rixford, plant physiologist of the United States Department of Agriculture.

PROFITABLE SEASON

DELANO.—The local association's plant has shipped 1000 tons of raisins, according to Manager K. M. Hanson, who is cleaning up tag ends of the season's run. He estimates that there are still about thirty-five tons of fruit scattered over the district. This will be sent north. Mr. Hanson reports a very successful season for this district. Early crop estimates set the tonnage at between 600 and 700.

PLAN CANAL EXTENSION

NILAND.—If the plans offered by residents of this vicinity are carried out, nearly 16,000 acres of farm land close to Niland will be placed under irrigation, according to the promoters of the project, who propose to extend the east high line canal to a point where it will provide water for more than twenty-five sections. The land will be bonded to build the canal extension, and later annexed by the Niland Irrigation District.

OVERSEAS SHIPMENT

SAN DIEGO.—The Isthmian line freighter, Birmingham City, cleared from the harbor recently with 1000 bales of Imperial Valley cotton, consigned to Liverpool, for the British textile trade. This was the second shipment of cotton from this port to England during the season.

POULTRY PROFITABLE

POMONA.—Poultry authorities estimate that there are 100,000 hens within a radius of six or seven miles from the center of the city of Pomona. This figure would indicate that the poultry industry is fast becoming an important one in this section. According to the computations the total egg production for the last year was 1,200,000 dozen, which, at an average price of 32 cents per dozen, would make an egg income of $384,000. In addition fowls sold for meat and breeding purposes and droppings sold for fertilizer brought an approximate total of about $200,000, it is estimated.

QUARANTINE MEETING

PHOENIX, ARIZ.—The Western Plant Quarantine Board will meet in Phoenix next May in its fifth annual session. The board has in its membership quarantine officials of California, Arizona, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Nevada, Utah, Montana, Colorado, New Mexico and the northern district of Lower California. Charles A. Parks of Oregon is chairman and Lee A. Strong of California secretary. State Entomologist Don C. Mote will act as local secretary for arrangement of details of the coming session.

NEW OFFICERS CHOSEN

REDLANDS.—The report of Manager H. W. Seager, read at the regular annual meeting of the Redlands-Highland Exchange, recently held, presented convincing evidence that the citrus industry is the financial and industrial foundation of this section. The exchange shipped 1462 cars despite the seasonal frost damage. The cash returns were amost $3,000,000, the fruit being distributed by the California Fruit Exchange. The year's shipments showed a reduction of 50 per cent over the 1921 shipments. The report covered all the marketing activities of the concern and touched on the recent trip of Mr. Seager to the eastern markets. The new officers of the exchange are L. M. Winston, president; Frank Cram, vice-president; H. W. Seager, secretary-treasurer-manager; directors, L. M. Winston, J. E. Mills, F. L. Cram, A. E. Frost, N. B. Hinckley, J. S. Edwards, R. S. Thompson, J. D. Langford, A. M. Patterson, James Simmonds and J. L. Yarnell. J. S. Edwards is to represent the concern on the board of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange.

GROWERS ORGANIZE

EL CENTRO.—H. T. Jones, a former grocer, who took up farming in the Imperial Valley for the dual purpose, he says, of making money and regaining his health, is one of the moving spirits in the new "Meloland Shippers and Growers," organized for the purpose of growing and shipping vegetables. The organization has just completed the erection of a large shipping shed at Meloland, on the Holton Interurban Railroad, from which lettuce shipments are being made. Tomatoes, onions, peas, cantaloupes and other vegetables will be shipped in season. As a grocer Mr. Jones has had experience as a buyer and shipper of the products of the farm, and he has a theory that every producer should be in close touch with distribution, in fact, a part of it, in order to get full reward for his labor. Mr. Jones, himself, has a forty-acre vineyard and is raising lettuce and other vegetables.

DAIRYING LOOKS UP

PHOENIX (Ariz.)—The dairy industry is looking up again in the Salt River Valley and the number of dairy animals increasing, though it is still far from the number known in the days before the war. Many of the producers of the valley have organized into the "Arizona Dairy Producers," and now are getting from a local creamery a price for No. 1 cream 1 cent below the wholesale butter quotation reported daily by the Los Angeles Produce Exchange. The price is said to be 2 cents above what had been the return for cream shipped to Californai and to be materially above the price formerly paid by Arizona creameries. Arizona dairymen are now said to be using a degree of care never before known to ensure a high-grade product. There has been formed a Maricopa County Cow Testing Association, in which 540 cows are now being tested. The leader for the last month reported was L. A. Johnson's Bonnie of Mesa, with 1193 pounds of milk, or sixty-two pounds of butter fat. The second cow produced 1925 pounds of milk, with 55.8 pounds of fat. The State authorities are keeping a close watch on bovine tuberculosis and in a single month recently condemned and killed twelve dairy cows in Greenlee and Graham counties.

COMING ORANGE SHOW PLANS NEW FEATURES

SAN BERNARDINO.—Plans for the entertainment program of the National Orange Show, which opens February 16, are being completed, and, according to the management, will include many amusement features of the latest creation.

The industrial division of the show is planned to be of great educational value, displaying the latest improvements in citrus-cultural methods, including frost protection equipment, and other aids towards higher production of better quality fruit. The by-products division, a relatively new phase of the industry, is being designed to emphasize the value of salvaging cull and damaged fruit.

The orange and lemon sweepstakes never fail to arouse interest on the part of the growers throughout the State, and the competition for honors in this event, according to Manager N. R. Mack, will bring up the standard of the fruit entered for display.

SEES BETTER TIMES AHEAD FOR FARMER

In a New Year's statement, in which he reviewed agricultural conditions of the past year and discussed prospects for 1923, Secretary of Agriculture Wallace said:

"Twelve months ago most of the 6,000,000 farmers of the United States were starting on the long hard climb out of the valley of economic depression. They have not yet attained the heights which are bathed in the grateful sunshine of prosperity. Some, indeed, have fallen by the way. Others are still in the valley. Nevertheless, as we stop a bit and look backward we can see that very considerable ground has been gained by the great majority, and we can enter the new year with renewed hope and with that courage which comes from the realization that we are really making progress.

"A year ago, when speaking of the prospects for farming in 1922, I said that while there was no reason to expect boom times for the farmer in the near future, there was promise of better times, both for the farmer and for those whose business is largely dependent upon him. The year has brought fulfillment of that promise. Speaking generally, times are better, much better, than a year ago, both for agriculture and for industry.

"Crops have been good, on the whole. Prices of the major crops are mostly considerably higher. While there has been a corresponding advance in the prices of the things the farmer must buy, the total sum which farmers will receive for the crops of this year is greater by a $1,500,000,000 or more than that which they received for the crops of last year. This will certainly mean better times on the farm, and farm folks will be able to ease up a little on the grinding economy they were forced to practice the preceding year.

"The labor cost of producing the crops of 1922 was still further reduced. There were some substantial reductions in freight rates. Much helpful legislation has been enacted and more will be this winter. Interest rates are lower and the credit strain has been eased. This has made it possible for many farmers who were rather heavily involved to refund their obligations and get themselves in condition to win through.

"There are still some dark spots. In some sections weather conditions were unfavorable and crops were short, and farmers in these sections are having a very hard time of it. Freight rates are still too high, especially for those who must pay for a long haul to market.

"Taxes are high, but this is largely due to the increase in local taxes, over which farmers themselves must exercise control.

"There has been gratifying growth in farmers' co-operative marketing associations, and more of them are being organized on a sound business basis.

"Aside from the help which has been given by legislation and by administration activities, strong economic forces are at work to restore a more normal relation between agriculture and other industries.

"The peril in the agricultural depression is more keenly realized by other groups than ever before, and on every hand a sincere desire is being widenced to do what can be done safely to help the farmer better his condition.

"Everything considered, we have good reason to expect still better things for agriculture in the year 1923."

OUTLAW PLANT IS HARD TO CONQUER

EL CENTRO.—Horticultural Commissioner Waite who, for several years, has been waging a relentless warfare for the extermination of Johnson grass, is discouraged because he cannot get at the source of the trouble. Annually he and his deputies make a survey of the valley and remove or order the removal of every stalk of Johnson grass they can find. The next year they have the same task to do over again, and the next year, and the next, and so on ad infinitum. It seems with every succeeding year that this outlaw plant becomes more and more prevalent.

The Gila River traverses the State of Arizona and on its banks in many places Johnson grass is grown for hay. Naturally large quantities of it go to seed and much of the seed gets into the river. As the Gila empties into the Colorado at Yuma, above where it is diverted into the Imperial Valley, the Johnson grass seed comes into the valley in the irrigation ditches. It will be impossible to get rid of it, horticultural officials say, until the State of Arizona declares it to be a noxious weed and starts a campaign for its extermination.

MANY FANCIERS SHOW

PASADENA.—With 700 fowls entered the thirteenth annual show of the Pasadena Poultrymen's Association, which closed January 6, attracted a large number of poultry fanciers from all over Southern California. The cup for the best pen was awarded to Sands Brothers of Pasadena, who exhibited Rhode Island Reds. A Dark Cornish cockerel, entered by Mrs. R. D. Morris, won the cup for the best male. The cup for the best female was given to W. W. Whitney, for a Buff Orpington pullet. The show was held at the local Armory.

The preliminary estimates of the 1922-23 orange crop, by the California Fruit Growers' Exchange indicate a production of about 75 per cent of a normal crop.

QUARANTINE RULES MADE MORE EXPLICIT

To make more explicit the inspection requirements at ports of entry, the Federal Horticultural Board, United States Department of Agriculture, recently put into effect a revision of its quarantine of Hawaii on account of the Mediterranean fruit fly and the melon fly. Under the new regulations ships are required to dispose of all fruits and vegetables before arriving at territorial waters of the United States. Inspection of arriving ships to conform with the current practice of the public health service is provided for. Vessels found to be infested or to contain infested material must be disinfected before leaving the quarantined area. The new regulations make more explicit the inspection of baggage and cargo on the deck.

COUNTY APPROPRIATION

POMONA.—According to a recent report of County Flood Control Engineer Reagen, $5000 worth of material will be furnished by the county for the improvement of the creek bed below the San Dimas Dam, as a part of the flood-control program in that vicinity.

BABY CHICKS

The hatching capacity of England's Egg Ranch is very limited, owing to the fact that we hatch nothing but our OWN eggs, laid by our OWN hens and the hatching done entirely by Geo. C. England personally. We hatch only during the months of February, March, April and May. Therefore you should book your orders now. Our chicks will please you and prove to you their careful breeding.

HERE IS THE PROOF

"Of the 500 chicks purchased from you May 18th, we have 227 perfect pullets, not a cull amongst them and they are laying 50 per cent now. Herewith my check for $60.00; please book my order for 1300 for 1923." Another one: "Could you furnish 1500 chicks in one lot, between March 1st and March 15th? The chicks you furnished us last year were very satisfactory, and the pullets raised from them have done very well this fall. For your information, would say that our entry at Pomona are pullets raised from your chicks." This is one of the High Leghorn pens to date. A great many of the 200-egg hens at the last Southern California contest were either pure ENGLAND strain or sired by our males. One pen hatched in February from our eggs averaged 201 eggs each. Our pen averaged 226 eggs and won the contest.

GRAPE EXPERT WILL WORK ON TEST PLOTS

Grape growers, and those contemplating planting grapes, will have the opportunity of attending field demonstrations on pruning and trellising of vines, which are to be given by Prof. Frederic T. Bioletti of the University of California and his assistant, Mr. Jacob, in co-operation with the Agricultural Extension Service of Los Angeles county. Two days will be devoted to these demonstrations in Los Angeles county. The first two meetings will be held in the San Fernando Valley, on January 16, one at 10 a.m., on the place of Norman Johnson, Chatsworth, one-half mile north of the schoolhouse on the boulevard, and the other at 2 p.m., at the vineyard of Dr. J. H. I. Budau, one and one-half miles north of the San Fernando Road on Hubbard avenue, San Fernando.

One of the features of the Chatsworth meeting will be the establishing of a trellis system for cordon pruning, on the variety test plot which is being conducted by the Agricultural Extension Service, in co-operation with Mr. Johnson. Pruning of young and old vines also will be demonstrated. At the San Fernando meeting, a demonstration will be given on cordon pruning, following the establishing of the trellis system last year.

A demonstration will be given at Littlerock on January 19, at 1:30 p.m., at the place of Mr. Miller and Mr. Kling. This will be for both trellising and pruning of young and old vines.

TULE BEDS SUPPLY USEFUL MATERIALS

CALIPATRIA.—One of the most unique industries in Imperial Valley is the tule mat work being done by Pedro and Frank Barrette at their ranch, just a mile west of this city. Made from the strong, hemplike tule grass, which grows in such abundance in the sloughs adjacent to this district, the material of the mats costs nothing but the time to gather it.

A crude loom is used to make the mats. For the foundation a dozen or more wires are hung from the roof of the shed, where the work is done, in pairs and the tules are laid between the wires, in bunches about two inches thick. These are fastened in place by means of bobbins of wire and are so woven together that the finished rug, while not a thing of beauty, is strong, serviceable and waterproof.

Pedro Barrette brought this industry from his home in sunny Italy, where, in the lowlands surrounding the sloping vineyards, grows a strong, fiberous grass, similar to the tule. He has just completed a contract with the Balfour-Guthrie Company for a large number of the mats, which were used by that company instead of lumber, to roof their new hog sheds.

When completed the mats measure about 8 by 16 feet. They are cheap and durable, and are used by the Mexicans for "ramadas." One can be quickly constructed by setting a few stakes in the ground, fastening a couple of tule mats around the sides, with one over the top for a roof. The mats are rolled up by the Mexicans when the cotton-picking is over and carried along to other sections, where work can be found.

TO PLANT PEARS IN THE YUCAIPA VALLEY

YUCAIPA.—The Howard L. Rivers Company of Los Angeles recently purchased about 140 acres in the Dunlap Ranch section of the Yucaipa Valley and, according to reports, will plant the whole to pears. The company has been negotiating for the finest nursery stock to be had and plans a pear orchard that will be a record producer. This spring the planting of the acreage to the Bosch and the Winter Nellis varieties will be started. The contract for preparing the ground and setting out the trees has been let.

Mr. Rivers states that he has found by experience that the fruit grown in Yucaipa Valley keeps as well as any he has handled, and is of such good flavor and consistent quality as to always bring a good price in the market. There have been several large pear orchards which came into bearing of recent years, and they have produced a fine quality of fruit which assures the adaptability of the location for the growing of the fruit. The 140-acre orchard will be the largest pear orchard in the valley. M. E. Bise has also just purchased about forty acres in that section, which he will set out to pears, and it is estimated that within two or three years there will be 600 or more acres in the valley planted to pears. The peach acreage will also be increased during the coming spring planting season.

In 1920 the area irrigated in the United States amounted to approximately 10,000,000 acres, and the annual gross returns from irrigated lands is now nearly half a billion dollars.

RABBIT BREEDERS REPORT PROGRESS

ONTARIO.—That the Ontario-Upland Rabbit Breeders' Association has grown, in less than two years, from a membership of twelve, representing about 100 breeding does, to more than 125 members, representing 3500 breeding does, was the declaration of J. N. Dean, secretary of the organization, in his report to the members, at their recent annual meeting.

Mr. Dean's report showed what progress had been made by the organization, particularly in marketing. As an example it was pointed out that a single buyer of rabbits for eating purposes now averages more than 3000 rabbits a month from the local association. The report also showed that sales through the association for breeding purposes now average more than $200 a month.

D. A. Hanna of Ontario was elected president of the association for 1923; W. E. Dean of Pomona, vice-president; R. H. Rumohr, Ontario, second vice-president; J. N. Dean, Upland, secretary and treasurer, and L. S. Taylor, Ontario, additional member of the executive board.

LOCAL MAN WINS

POMONA.—Paul A. Kennedy, a local Rhode Island Red fowl fancier, who was superintendent of the poultry department at the last Los Angeles County Fair, won awards on four of his Rhode Island Red entries at the El Paso Poultry Show recently held in that city. Mr. Kennedy entered both pullets and cockerels.

be of sufficient size to house all big shows. It will include a horse show arena 120 by 330 feet in size, and ample space for the showing of beef and dairy cattle, horses, sheep, hogs and poultry. It is hoped to have this pavilion completed by the opening of next year's live-stock show.

F. F. Peabody, owner of the Eagle Ranch of Santa Margarita, recently added nine head of prize-winning Aberdeen-Angus cattle to his big herd. The cattle purchased comprise two bulls and seven females, and were secured from Ames Plantation herd, GrandJunction, Tenn. With the addition of this purchase, Mr. Peabody will have increased his herd to about 150 head of purebreds, making it rank as one of California's choicest beef herds of doddies.

California has a new junior 2-year-old champion Jersey in Valet's Jaunette. This heifer started test at 2 years of age and in one year produced 9695 pounds of milk and 610.32 pounds of butter fat. She calved within the required time, carrying calf 241 days during test and thus qualifies for a silver medal as well. She was sired by D's L's Valet of L., out of Jaunette's Glory, a daughter of Undulata Prince. She is owned by Grant Brown, El Monte.

Nine California Holstein cows now hold production records of over 1000 pounds butter fat in one year. The latest of these to add to the State's rapidly growing dairy fame in Aralia De Kol Mead 2d, who recently completed a 365-day test period with a record of 26,938.5 pounds milk containing 1043.07 pounds butter fat—equivalent to 1303.83 pounds butter. She made this record on the farm of her owners, the A. W. Morris & Sons Corporation, Woodland. Late figures show that there are now seventy-five cows of all breeds with 1000-pound yearly butter fat records. Aralia is 7 years old, weighs 1700 pounds and is one of twins. Her recent record completes a family of three generations in which each dam has produced over 900 pounds butter fat in one year. She comes by her producing ability quite naturally as she is the grand-daughter of the first and third cows to produce over 28,000 pounds milk in 365 days. These two cows are Aralia De Kol and Riverside Sadie De Kol Burke, the foundation matrons of the Morris herd. "During eight months of her test period Aralia was permitted to run at pasture with the other cows of the herd and was milked regularly four times a day," says F. L. Morris, one of the owners. Her grain ration consisted of ground barley, oats, bran and linseed oil meal, which was fed throughout the year in amounts of twelve to twenty pounds daily, according to her production and appetite. This was supplemented by roots and corn ensilage during two-thirds of the year and with all the alfalfa hay she would eat.

W. J. Higdon, president of the California Holstein-Friesian Association, has appointed William R. Harriman, Hondo; Alex Whaley, Tulare; F. L. Morris, Woodland, and C. L. Hughes, Sacramento, to serve as the committee to select the top Holsteins for the 1923 Guaranty Sale, which will be held at Tulare, California, on April 4. The cattle will all be selected from herds owned by members of the California Holstein-Friesian Association, as was done last year, and the only basis of selection will be individual merit.

Bessie Snowball De Kol, owned by Fred Hartsook, Lankershim, has lately completed an official record of 40.39 pounds butter from 719.6 pounds milk in seven days, making her the fifth forty-pound cow for California. She milked 109.9 pounds her best day and reached her great production on a comparatively light grain ration. When she had reached a maximum of twenty pounds grain per day it was evident that the ration was not to her liking and the amount was then reduced to sixteen pounds, which apparently just suited her. This great cow was one of the top cows in Mr. Hartsook's show herd last year, standing close to the top in the northern shows, although showing under the handicap of being dry. At Riverside she went to the top of the aged-cow class and was later made grand champion. In addition to her splendid type and great seven-day record, she has already demonstrated her ability as a long-time producer, as last year she made 1121.88 pounds butter from 27,616.8 pounds milk in 365 days, her first time on long-time test.

Nearly two-thirds of the butter produced in the United States in 1921 was made in creameries, according to a report of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Perris Valley's "Hunch"

ginned, was sixty-seven bales. This, however, sold for 20 cents a pound, being about the only crop which the valley grew at a profit during that disastrous year.

SWITCH TO ACALA

year the growers of the valley decided to plant no more Durango. It was found that the Acala variety had a measurably shorter season, and offered certain additional advantages. Accordingly, it has been put in to the exclusion of all other kinds. Choice seed was obtained, all from rogued fields. About 400 acres were planted. However, it is interesting to observe that a large part of this acreage was dry-farmed. Some of the new growers bungled the care of their crop, but the experienced planters have had excellent results. About 110 bales will be year's total. The price is excellent, also, some of the cotton having been sold, as soon as it was out of the gin, for 26 cents a pound.

Fields of Durango Cotton.

Among year's growers the Liberty Ranch has had as good success as any. This ranch planted twenty acres, but did not get the seed into the ground until May 25, a month late. Nevertheless, their yield is about eighteen bales. They have informed Mr. Talbot that they will have a largely increased planting year.

About the most interesting experience is that of W. W. Connell, who lives in the Antelope district, at the extreme southern end of the valley. He had a young orchard, in good, but nonirrigated land. He intercropped in with cotton, just to see what he could do with it. It was estimated that he had about six acres planted. This cotton had not a single drop of water, except what fell as rain. But Mr. Connell picked three bales of high-grade cotton from the six acres, which he sold for 26 cents per pound. He will plant from forty to eighty acres next year, while a number of his neighbors will follow his example by devoting considerable land to cotton. In a dry-farming region, to make more than the value of the land in one year, is all that can be asked of any crop.

NEXT SEASON'S PLANS

The Perris gin, which is now managed by Mr. Talbot, under lease from the association, is the only one in Southern California west of the Coachella Valley. In addition to the Perris cotton, it has this year ginned small amounts from Hemet, West Riverside and Baldwin Park. C. M. Herkest of Baldwin Park year grew eight bales on ten acres, and says he can grow a bale and a half to the acre. Heavy plantings are expected this coming year in all these three localities, 1000 acres being promised in West Riverside and 100 in Hemet. About 1000 acres are expected in the Perris Valley, and this may be increased as other farmers become impressed with the success of this year's crop.

In some communities where it has been tried, cotton has brought in an undesirable class of settlers, but there has been thus far no indication of that effect in this community. The work, including chopping and picking, has practically all been done by white people. For picking they have been paid two cents per pound, and some of them have made as high as $6 per day.

When the new crop was first introduced to this locality, the word of the Imperial Valley experts was taken as to the proper way of growing it. The farmers were advised not to force the cotton at first, but when the blooming began, to pour on the water. This was done, with the result that many of the squares fell, while the plants were forced to luxuriant growth, and were in a rank, soft condition when the frosts came. The crop was not properly matured, and a large part of it was lost. By three years of bitter experience, the growers of the region have found that under Perris Valley conditions the proper method is to plant as near the first of May as possible, force the plants by frequent irrigations until about the first of August, then lay the field by and let the plants mature. This rieties that have been improved for commercial production, are limited in their possibilities to table and fresh-juice purposes. Hence the nation's raisin production, as well as that of wine and brandy, has devolved almost entirely upon California, where warmth and absence of rain at harvest time favor both industries. But it may be added that California produces also table grapes of European and improved European kinds that are considered by many people to be the finest eating grapes in the world.

EFFECT OF PROHIBITION

The condition of the threefold grape industry in California has never been better since prohibition came. It was thought at first that our grape growers had been dealt a fatal blow by the Eighteenth Amendment. The first year after the amendment a small percentage of the vineyards were taken out. But, most amazingly, the price of grapes began to mount skyward. Not only did the growers let up on making over vineyards into peach orchards and walnut groves, but great numbers of outsiders were attracted into the business. During the past two or three years the plantings of vineyards in the State have increased 60 per cent.

Whereas before prohibition the vineyardists used to think they were doing well if they could get $12 or $15 a ton for their grapes, after two years of dry sailing, they began to get such amazing prices as $100, even $125, per ton. They were making more money than orange growers in the most favorable seasons. Last season the market broke, but even with the high prices halved or quartered, the grape growers are in a more fortunate situation than before the amendment.

THE NATURAL QUESTION

The question naturally arises, What is being done with the wine grapes? We may find an answer in the full-blast harvest operations, if not full-blast winery operations, of the Italian Vineyard Company. This company has 5000 acres planted to forty odd varieties of grapes in the San Bernardina Valley, between Ontario and Colton. Its wine presses, vats, shipping-houses and bungalow community occupy about forty acres in the middle of the vineyards. In a corner of its territory is a fine walnut grove; but the walnut-harvest season comes on during the grape-picking; and grapes are so much more valuable that the grove has become a sort of free-for-all nutting ground for the passing public. The company has a hobby for Guernsey milk cows and Berkshire hogs. Its dairy is a model of aristocratic appointments for the handling of the cows and the care of the milk. For supplementary feeding of the hogs and the utilization of a by-product, it has a large mill for separating seeds from skin after the grapes come out of the presses; the hogs eat the seeds in combinations with grains and the skins are distributed in the fields as fertilizer.

An air of neatness, thrift and prosperity pervades the whole establishment; and well it should, for this winery, reputed to be the largest in the world, far from being made bankrupt by a bone-dry America, is enjoying a huge increase in profits. Year before last its great presses, having a capacity of 450 tons of grapes a day, made expensive wines and brandies for medicinal and sacramental purposes, and other wines of low alcoholic content for other purposes, unceasingly throughout the season. But last year the winery ran only sufficiently to keep the excess grapes left after shipping from spoiling. For in the nation-wide demand for "juice" grapes fresh, a much greater and more facile means to conversion of grapes into money has been presented to the smiling vineyardists. Until the car shortage interfered, the company was packing and shipping forty carloads of grapes at a time, the juicy produce, billed in small lots to points all over the United States, being as high as $140 per ton.

It is an anomalous situation. The vineyardists accept it blandly. Hundreds of people are hastening to become vineyardists. But those steeped in the business cannot understand it and do not attempt to explain it. They feel, however, that it cannot last forever, and they are not indulging in too sanguine hopes for the future. Their vineyards are interplanted in places with walnut or fruit trees, now getting along toward the bearing age. A knotty problem faces some of them: they do not know whether to take out the vines or the trees.

One thing is certain. Bacchus is not moping forlorn on the top of some desert mountain; he is masquerading in California in the guise of King Midas. He came into California with the padres; he contributed more toward the upbuilding of the far-west land than any other one industry. The human race is used to having him around: he has chummed with the mighty and the weak, the rich and the poor, the wise and the foolish, the devout and the profane, since the world began.

But Bacchus must not be confused with John Barleycorn. While the native grapes of America were not suited to the production of wine, the barley and corn that grow so abundantly in our fertile valleys and plains proved altogether too well suited to the manufacture of strong malt liquors. America had its liquor problem thrust upon it. But prohibition is teaching America the distinction between Bacchus and John Barleycorn; it is teaching America to discard those strong and burning decoctions derived from the perverted use of cereals, and to use sensibly instead the pleasing and harmless natural beverages drawn from the Vitis Vinifera, a name signifying the vine of life.

Big Seed Catalog Ready for Growers

Morris & Snow Seed Company of Los Angeles Issues Big Annual Book.

The Morris & Snow Seed Company of Los Angeles, one of the oldest and largest seed houses in California, has just issued its 1923 catalog. The book contains a vast amount of valuable information to orchardists, ranchers, gardeners and growers generally. The big book is really a manual because of the "Hints on Growing," which presents valuable information on spraying, fumigating, fertilizing and use of insecticides. It tells how and when to sow seeds and set out plants for best results, and explains the correct use of tools and implements. Notes on marketing, telling how, when and where to buy and sell to advantage is another feature of the 1923 volume. The big book contains 64 pages and has more than 150 illustrations. It is said to be the most complete book of its kind ever issued in the Southwest. The company announces that a copy of the book will be sent free to readers of this paper who write for it. The address of the Morris & Snow Seed Company is 439 South Main Street, Los Angeles, California. (Adv.)

A New Discovery Makes Hens Lay

Any poultry raiser can easily and quickly double his profits by doubling his egg yield through the remarkable discovery of M. B. Smith, a Kansas City chemist.

Working along entirely original lines, Mr. Smith discovered why hens lay less in winter than in summer and perfected a formula that turns loafers into layers and profit makers.

Within five or six days this discovery, which is called Ditto Egg Tablets, will rejuvenate your flock. Your hens will go strutting and cackling about with red combs and full of life and pep. Every nest will yield an egg nearly every day in the week, which means a lot, since eggs are certain to sell for 60 cents or more. This is not guess work, as over 100,000 successful poultry raisers testify to the value of Mr. Smith's products.

Although different from anything you ever heard of, Ditto Egg Tablets are easily administered by simply dropping in drinking water.

So confident is Mr. Smith you can double or triple your egg yield, that he offers to send two large $1 packages of Ditto Egg Tablets (enough for a season) to any reader who will write for them. If you are satisfied they cost only $1 on this introductory offer, otherwise, nothing.

Send no Money—just your name and address to M. B. Smith, 1257 Coca Cola Bldg., Kansas City, Mo. The two $1 packages will be mailed immediately. When they arrive pay the postman only $1 and postage. Use the tablets 10 days. If you are not getting more eggs or are not satisfied for any reason, simply return unused tablets and your money will be returned immediately without question. A big Kansas City bank guarantees the reliability of this offer. Write today before this introductory offer is withdrawn, as you can sell one package to a friend and thus get your own free.—[Advertisement.

est dams are all 1000-pound cows, with an average of 1181.74 pounds butter and 25,719.4 pounds milk in one year, the highest butter average for any bull in the world. His seven nearest dams each has two or more yearly records, the best two years of each averaging for the seven, 2120.89 pounds butter and 47,196.4 pounds milk, an average unequalled by the like dams of any other bull. Five of his seven nearest dams have produced six 1000-pound daughters. Six of his seven nearest dams, which excludes his own dam, with no daughters yet to complete yearly records, have produced ten daughters that have made seventeen yearly records, averaging 991.33 pounds butter and 21,028.4 pounds milk, including four two-year-old records and two 305-day records. He is 100 per cent the same blood, being by the same sire and out of a full sister to the dam, as Sir Aaggie Mead De Kol, that topped the Philadelphia National at $11,000 and was successfully used in the Arfmann and Amos herds in New York. He is by the same sire and out of a daughter of the dam of Sir Aaggie Mead, the second highest-priced bull ever sold at public sale in California, now owned by W. J. Higdon and P. M. Longan, Tulare, and F. S. Borror & Son, Tipton. He is also by the same sire as Sir Aaggie De Kol Mead, the $30,000 bull now siring a high-class lot of calves in the noted herd owned by Fred Hartsook, Lankershim. The placing of Prince Aaggie of Berylwood at the head of the choice females composing the Berylwood Stock Farm herd is regarded as a master stroke on the part of J. W. Snodgrass, manager of the ranch, and the fact that the service of this great sire has been made available for all the high-class calf-club heifers in Ventura county, on purely nominal terms, should result in a most substantial benefit to the dairy industry of that section.

Five California cows headed the list of high producers in the cow-testing associations of the seven western States for November, according to the western office of the Federal Dairy Division at Salt Lake City. The first of these is a grade Holstein, owned by C. S. Walker of Santa Ana, with a record of 114.5 pounds of fat for the month. Other owners of high-producing cows are A. B. Comfort, Hanford; J. L. Sebastian, Wasco; James Biffa, Petaluma, and J. Chapman, Salida. The States included in the report are Oregon, Idaho, Washington, California, Colorado, Utah and Arizona. These States have a total of thirty-nine cow-testing associations, of which eighteen are in California. The grand total number of cows being tested is 23,894, of which 2892 produced more than forty pounds of fat during the month. Of those above forty pounds of fat 1689 are California cows. More than half of all the cows tested are in California. The association with the highest average for the month is that at Delhi, with an average production of 37.7 pounds per cow. But the total number of cows in this association is only fifty-five. Orange county's association, with 790 cows, reports the second best average, 34.8 pounds, and Petaluma, with 823 cows, is third, with an average production per cow of 31.9 pounds.

Winifred Hotaling Pontiac, owned by W. J. Higdon, Tulare, has broken the world's record for 305-day butter production in the junior two-year-old class, with 802.05 pounds butter from 20,015 pounds milk. The new world's record producer is a daughter of the noted King Korndyke 20th, son of Miss Valley Mead De Kol Walker, and is out of the thirty-two pound foundation cow, Winifred Hotaling 3d, that made 952.78 pounds butter from 20,314.1 pounds milk in 313 days. Coloma Beauty Butter Maid 2d, a senior two-year-old daughter of King Korndyke Pontiac 20th, and the well-known thirty-four pound four-year-old Coloma Beauty Butter Maid, also finished a 305-day record with 707.04 pounds butter from 17,272.9 pounds milk. About a dozen daughters of King Korndyke Pontiac 20th, mostly first-calf heifers, are now on [illegible] close to the 1100-pound mark with her second calf.

The date for the next California National Live-stock Show at San Francisco has been tentatively fixed for Oct. 20-28, 1923.

There is a Reason

Why is it that every season in every hatch we bring off, we are invariably sold out of chicks?

Why is it that on January 1st we had booked nearly 50% of our total season's output in view of the fact that we have doubled our hatching capacity over last year?

Why is it that our customers are very often able to raise their chicks to laying age with only 5% losses?

Why is it that last season's customers almost without exception are placing their orders with us this year?

THERE IS A REASON

It is because "SUPERIOR STRAIN" S. C. WHITE LEGHORNS have for twelve years been scientifically bred for heavy egg production, first and foremost, but with a signal beauty of form and feathers as well.

It is because our breeding hens are happy and contented; fed right and handled right; because the hatching eggs are carefully selected; because they are incubated successfully; and because we absolutely guarantee full 100% of strong chicks upon delivery.

It is because we take a personal interest in every chick we sell.

DRY CHILI FOR CONDIMENTS AN ORANGE COUNTY PRODUCT

BY ROSS H. GAST.

WITH the assurance of a better market for their products last year, the growers of California and Mexican chilis in the Garden Grove district of Orange county began their drying season in good spirits. The year before half the district's crop burned in the warehouse, and this, coupled with the poor prices received, brought little return for the year's work. The burning of the warehouse precluded any chance of the "hold-overs" flooding the market last year, and the demand for the dried product is reported to be increasing

The culture of chilis for drying purposes is the same as that for pimientos, described in a previous article. The seed is sown directly in the field, during the month of March, and, later, the plants are thinned to twenty inches apart in the rows. The chilis, too, are a long maturing crop, requiring ample funds to finance their planting, and care. Most of them are grown on high rental lands, and the profit margin is narrow, often too narrow.

The fruits are allowed to remain on the plants until October, when the drying season begins. At that time, they are a mature red, and most of them are ready for the drying shed. The Mexican and Japanese workmen pick the fruits in buckets, and sack them; then they are hauled to the dry houses.

Formerly, all chilis were sun dried, but this proved to be too slow and expensive, so dry houses were substituted. There is a difference in opinion as to the comparative quality of sun drys and those artificially dried. In general, it is held that those dried artificially, when handled right, compare favorably with the sun drys, though many jobbers prefer the latter.

The dry houses are built so that they can be closed tightly, except for the ventilators on the roof, which can be regulated. Gas, which is used to generate the heat, is conducted through eight rows of pipe, laid along the floor, with jets inserted every two or three feet. The trays, on which the chilis are placed, are 2 by ½ feet in size, with a screen bottom, each house holding about 600 sets in tiers.

Two Ways of Drying Chilis

Top—Dry house on Orange county pepper farm. Below—Sun-drying, the old method.

The drying process takes about a week. The first two days, the houses are kept at a temperature of 120 degrees, with the ventilators wide open; then the temperature is gradually increased to 140 degrees, and the ventilators closed down. These ventilators carry off the moisture from the drying out of the chilis. Precautions are taken so that the temperature never goes above 140 degrees, as such a fault will cause the chilis to lose their flavor and color. Before this process was perfected, many peppers were ruined, and this fact is, in a measure, responsible for unpopularity of the artificial method of drying with some buyers.

Many growers have their own dry houses, others use those of their neighbors. At Garden Grove, there are a great many dry houses used by the Japanese (who grow the bulk of the chilis) through some sort of co-operative method. The product is warehoused in the same manner.

The chilis are graded into two sizes as soon as they are taken from the dry house, then are put in large sacks, to be taken to the warehouse, or to the jobbers, who contract for the crop in some instances. A large quantity of the local-grown product is made into chili powders and condiments in Los Angeles. The Orange county growers supply a great part of the dry chili demand of the entire United States.

The acreage last year was reported to be around 1500 for both the California (or Anaheim) and Mexican. The Mexican chili produces about three-fourths ton of dry chilis, while the Californias run slightly better. The green weight produced by both varieties is usually around seven tons to the acre. A prominent grower in the Garden Grove district states that the contract [illegible] the per acre production of drys only amounting to three-fourths ton, the acre profit figures around $46, it would appear.

All the operations, both in the culture and in the drying, are expensive. The growers pay from $30 to $50 per acre rental for the land, and during the drying season, the labor expense is very high. Mexicans do most of the sorting and grading, and are fairly reliable. They receive $2.50 a day in wages.

As the drying process is more or less a mechanical system, it could be called "dehydration." It seems that some of the new dehydrators perfected by the government could be put to good use in cutting down the expense of drying. It takes a long present system of drying. It takes a long time to get the crop through the dry houses, the season beginning in October and ending the first of the next year, so if the time now given to drying could be cut down, the crop could be moved sooner. As it is, the growers pick one week, and attend to their drying the next.

The dry chili industry is another Southern California industry that could be improved by the opening up of another growing district. Very soon, the land on which they are now grown will be used for other purposes. Southern California, in the past, has been depended upon for this product, and should not pass up any chances to hold on to her present trade. There are many acres of potential pepper land in this vicinity that could be developed, and should be, before the Orange county acreage is necessarily cut down.

WEAKENED CONDITION CAUSE OF GUMMOSIS

It is characteristic of practically all kinds of deciduous fruit trees to exude gum whenever weakened. The most common cause of gumming is dry subsoils, or at least fluctuating moisture conditions within the soil. However, there are other causes of gumming, such as crown gall, a disease which is characterised by having galls or knots formed around the base of the roots, and sometimes down on the roots, that cut off the circulation. Another cause of gumming is girdling of the trees by gophers. Excessive irrigation, too, will sometimes cause gumming.

The thing to do is to find out which of these various factors has caused the trouble. If it is lack of moisture then, after the rainy season, keep careful watch of the soils in regard to the moisture content, and never let them become dry. The time to irrigate is before the soils become dry and not afterward. As a temporary measure, whitewash the trees, to prevent sunburn. If the gumming is caused by crown gall, the probabilities are that the trees are too far gone to save. However, in the early stages of this disease, an effective treatment is to cut out the galls and paint the wounds with a disinfectant, such as Bordeaux mixture.—V.F.B.

The logan-blackberry is adapted to the milder parts of California, where the temperature does not reach zero.

The Livestock Bulletin.

BY [illegible]

Among some of the most vital problems pertaining to the cattle industry of the Southwest are the securing of lower freight rates, lower forest reserve fees, better government protection, a more uniform and orderly system of marketing, an extension of the present government market reporting system, safeguarding winter feed, warnings against overgrazing, and a general improvement of the quality of cattle marketed. All of these problems will be brought up by the American National Livestock Association at its convention which meets in Los Angeles, January 30, to February 1, inclusive.

Receipts of livestock in Los Angeles expanded somewhat during the first week of January over the small holiday-curtailed run of the week previous, but have been somewhat below trade requirements, according to the Federal State market reports. The market was on a quotably strong basis on everything of desirable killing quality, while there was noted a broadening demand for stockers and feeders. The week's supply at the Los Angeles Stock Yards consisted largely of Northern steers of medium and good beef grade. A six-car string of strictly good native Utah steers, fattened on a mixed ration of wheat tailings, bran, shorts and alfalfa hay, and averaging 1082 to 1146 pounds, sold at $8.50 to $8.65, topping the week's trade. They were among the best cattle received since the opening of this market. Nine loads of 1111 to 1169 pounds. Nevada fed steers scored $7.75 to $8.10 with one load of 961 pounds at $7.60. Another string of 175 Nevada fed steers, averaging 1118 pounds, sold at $8.00 with seventy-five of the same average weight, but in less desirable killing condition, going at $7.50. Good, tidy 1031-pound dehorned fed steers from Utah sold at $8.00, with horned 1062-pound steers of medium grade in the same shipment at $7.40. Eight dollars was paid for 1153 pounds locally fed Idaho steers at midweek. Several lots of medium grade light and medium weight steers, both grassers and shortfeds, cashed at $6.75 to $7.50, and a few light steers on the feeder order went for slaughter at $5.75 to $6.25. Practically no Arizona cattle arrived. Inquiry for stock and feeding cattle was broader than at any preceding time this season, but supplies were very light. Thirty-five head of well bred 632-pound Colorado feeder steers, yearlings and twos, scored $6.00. Numerous sales of Arizona stock cattle have been made recently on the range for Coast shipment. Two thousand two and three-year-old steers sold at $35 per head, f.o.b. Willcox. Supply of cow stuff has been light. Good 991-pound fed Utah cows and heifers sold up to $6.00, a string of five cars of Idaho cows made $5.50 straight, averaging 1079 pounds, and a load of 1048 pounds cows from that state sold at $5.60, with four of 957 pounds out at $4.75. Colorado and Texas heifers, the latter pastured in the Imperial Valley, sold at $5.50, averaging 725 and 672 pounds, respectively. They were well bred but in only medium killing flesh. A few common and medium butcher cows sold at $3.50 to $5.00, while some shelly Old Mexico canners found outlet at $1.50 to $1.55, decent canners selling upward to $2.50 and $3.00. Thirty-three head of well-fleshed 450-pound Colorado calves on the yearling order sold at $5.50 for slaughter. The supply on hogs has been very light and the market closed 25 to 50 cents higher than a week before, with strictly good 202-pound Idahos selling at $10.20 and some desirable 200-pound drive-ins at $10.00. Stock pigs have been in fair supply with sales largely at $8.50 to $9.25 for medium and good decks of ninety-two-pound California fed lambs, lacking good finish sold at $12.50, two decks of only medium killing grade, averaging ninety pounds at $11.60 and five decks of good 110-pound Utah ewes, selling at $7.00 with twenty-five of 134-pound average going out at $6.00.

Prince Aaggie of Berylwood, the sensational young sire owned by Berylwood Stock Farm, Hueneme, had centered upon him a large share of California Holstein honors for the year 1922. He first came into the limelight when he was purchased from A. W. Morris & Sons Corporation, Woodland, in February for $10,000, one of the three highest prices in the United States for the year, as reported. At the time of his purchase he ranked as the highest record bull of the breed in respect to yearly records of his seven nearest dams, and his own dam was then starting out on a very promising long-time test at mature age. When show time rolled around Prince Aaggie of Berylwood had rounded out into a real show bull and was the sensation of the 1922 California circuit, winning six grand championships in the State's best shows, returning home an undefeated grand champion. No other bull ever shown in the State has to his credit so many winnings in one season and before so many different judges. To round out the year his dam, Aralia De Kol Mead 2d, finished with 1301.47 pounds of butter from 26,938.5 pounds milk, adding materially to the average of his seven nearest dams. To give an idea of the great records behind Prince Aaggie of Berylwood and the proofs of uniform high production and reproduction among his nearest ancestors, the following facts are pertinent:

His three direct dams, Aralia De Kol Mead 2d, Aralia De Kol Mead and Aralia De Kol, form the highest producing three direct generations of cows of the entire breed, with an average of 1219.66 pounds butter in one year. His three nearest dams averaged 1282.79 pounds butter from 24,891 pounds milk in one year. His seven near-

EL CENTRO PLANS FOR BIG DAIRY MEETING

BY A. W. SWANSON

EL CENTRO.—Calexico had her cotton pageant, Brawley her fruit and poultry show, and now El Centro comes to the fore with the announcement of a Dairy Day, to be held January 20. It is to be sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce and in its announcement the committee in charge particularly emphasizes the fact that it is not to be an El Centro Dairy Day, nor yet an Imperial Valley Dairy Day, but a "Statewide" affair. The directors of the California Dairy Council will hold their quarterly meeting in El Centro January 19 and those attending will stay over to Dairy Day.

Imperial county has experienced a decided revival in dairy sentiment, and those interested in the industry hope to see the county elevated to even a more commanding position in this stable branch of agriculture. Imperial now stands fifth among the counties of California in butter-fat production, according to the latest report of the State Department of Agriculture.

Although only a tentative program has been announced, it is understood that some of the best dairy herds in the valley will be on exhibition, together with other herds from the outside. Several stock-judging contests will be participated in by dairy farmers, and by agricultural students from the various high schools of the valley. After the cows have been judged by the dairymen and students, they will be placed by a College of Agriculture judge, who will explain his reasons for so placing them.

Another feature planned is a raffle of three pure-bred bulls. Tickets will be sold to dairymen of the county, and the drawing will be on "Dairy Day."

The committee has invited Gov. Innocenti Lugo of the Upper District of Lower California, to be present as its guest. The Governor, it is believed, will accept the invitation, as it is known that he is deeply interested in agricultural matters. He is planning, it is said, to encourage farming in his district by land allotments and financial aid to worthy Mexican ranchers.

CALIFORNIA MUST ACT TO GET ITS SHARE OF EXPORT TRADE

BY R. BRINSMEAD

LONDON.—There are many direct and indirect factors which are today pointing to the truth that if California citrus and other fruits are to be firmly and profitably established upon the European, and at this time particularly the London markets, the slogan must be DO IT NOW. With over a 1,000,000 acres of tree fruits already planted in the State, who can question but that there will be an export surplus right along the line; that it is only a question of a short time before home markets will frequently reach the limit of absorption at profitable prices? California, it must be remembered, is not the only fruit-producing State in the Union.

The movement toward settling the British colonies with English-speaking agricultural settlers is rapidly expanding; and a point for the Californian to bear in mind is that no inconsiderable proportion of the many millions of dollars being spent by State and central governments of the Empire is upon the great expansion of their fruit industries, developed along California lines, to produce competitive crops for export to the London and other markets.

California apples, California navel oranges, California pears, California plums have been long and favorably known upon the London markets; but the California Valencia orange seems to be practically unknown. This fact was forcibly brought home, when following the arrival in London, some time ago, of a small consignment of some 200 boxes of Placentia (Orange county) California Valencias an inquiry at the leading fancy-fruit stores for California Valencias almost invariably produced Spanish fruit. Now we have contended for a number of years that not only will California Valencias logically become the Thanksgiving orange for home consumption, but that ultimately they will prove an important factor upon the late fall and even Christmas markets in Europe. In the face of very liberal supplies of and a not too brisk demand for, Spanish, Jamaican and Porto Rican oranges, the California Valencias were the only really ripe and well-colored oranges on the market and have brought a big premium, jobbing at from $7 to $8 a box, where Jamaicans were bringing around $5, and boxes of Spanish Valencias from a little over $3 to $4.

It is, of course, true that there promises to be but a small surplus of California Valencias for a few years; and as a prominent London handler remarked the other day, "The States can take care of them all," yet in view of the yearly and rapid increase of Cape and Australian summer oranges, it would seem a far-sighted policy to lay down small but regular shipments of Valencias here, even as part of the general advertising campaign. In this connection it is of interest to note that the British South Africa Company, which is developing extensive citrus properties in Rhodesia, is not consigning direct to commission house, jobber or auction in London or elsewhere; but is holding receipts at port of entry, in cold storage at Southampton and distributing as market conditions warrant from there. This policy has recently brought excellent prices for quite mediocre Rhodesian seedlings, which, so long as Cape and Australian Navels and Valencias were on the market, were almost impossible to move at anything like profitable prices.

The following table is of interest as showing the trend of current prices, as between November, 1921, and November, 1922. Following greatly reduced purchasing power on the part of the average consumer, coupled with liberal supplies, it yet follows the general trend of prices the world over, a revision which must take place before we all return to normalcy.

It is estimated by the United States Department of Agriculture that if prairie dogs were exterminated over their entire range in the countyr, 4,000,000 more cattle and 4,000,000 more sheep could be raised on that area, due to the increase in the supply of forage.

Under the Low Limbs
—Close to the Row

—without interfering with limbs or trunks—that's the way you want a tractor plow to work in your orchard. You can get the plow that meets that important requirement. John Deere built it for you. It is the

No. 26—The Low, Narrow
Plow with Stiff Hitch

Only 26 inches high when plowing six inches deep. Levers set low when plow is working, and are lowered as depth is increased.

Only 37 inches wide—gets up close to row, throwing either to or from trees—no projections outside of narrow wheel base to interfere with trees.

Stiff adjustable hitch permits setting plow out to right or left of tractor. Being stiff, the hitch tends to hold the plow in the furrow when offset; also aids in controlling rear wheel for short turns at the ends. This stiff hitch is an exclusive feature—no other orchard tractor disc plow has it.

Floating rear end—another great feature. Leaving set-screw collar on rear axle loose, permits plow to rise over roots without carrying weight of rear wheels—a big advantage in preventing damage to large roots.

Great clearance—frame is over discs—not at the side. High-quality, long-lived, smooth-running disc bearings. Simple, strong and positive power lift. Subsoiling and ridging attachments, profitable in sections where irrigation is conducted, can be furnished.

Real service. Adequate stocks of plows and repairs maintained at San Francisco, Portland, Seattle, Spokane and Boise. And there is a John Deere dealer with plows and repairs near you.

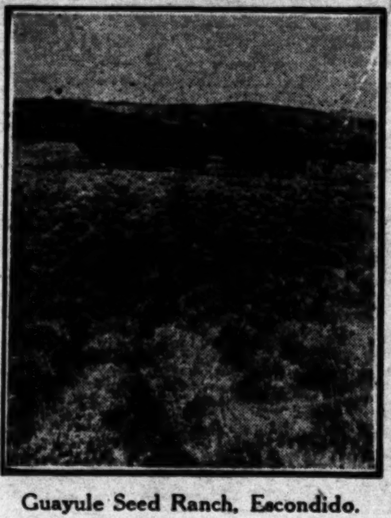
JOHN DEERE
THE TRADE MARK OF QUALITY MADE FAMOUS BY GOOD IMPLEMENTS

THE "MYSTERY RANCH" OF VALLEY CENTER

BY GEORGE B. BOWERS

ESCONDIDO.—"How strange! A plantation of sagebrush!" exclaim travelers passing through the highlands northeast of Escondido. Five hundred acres of white sage planted in neat rows would indeed be an unusual sight. No wonder the place is called the "Mystery Ranch" by the people of the locality.

The "Mystery Ranch" has a caretaker, a gentleman who could certainly not be called a mine of information. "Write of anything you see," is his courteous invitation in reply to all questions relating to the place.



Guayule Seed Ranch, Escondido.

The carefully cultivated shrubs, it should be explained, are not sage but guayule, our only native source of rubber. Guayule is a desert shrub, growing from one to four feet high, with a spreading crown. The bark of the trunk and twigs is light gray; the leaves are lanceolate or spatulate and variously dentate. Yellow flowers appear in September or October. It grows wild on the deserts of the American and Mexican borders.

This native rubber plant was discovered in 1852 by Dr. J. M. Bigelow, near Escondido Creek, Texas. Prof. Asa Gray, the renowned botanist, first described it and named it Parthenium argentatum, or silver Pallas.

Importation of guayule from Mexico amounted to 7000 tons in 1911. In 1917 it was only 1700 tons; now it is practically none. Mexican exploiters killed their profit by harvesting both root and stem.

In Arizona, guayule is now profitably cultivated, but is reaped instead of uprooted. There, with an abundance of cheap land and irrigation water, the outlook is said to be promising. Great difficulty had to be overcome to get the seed to germinate when gathered from plants grown under irrigation. While the Tucson laboratory has been able to overcome the problem of faulty germination, the Mystery Ranch has never experienced that trouble.

The rubber is obtained from the guayule plant by maceration, followed by well-known chemical processes. The bark and roots yield about three times as much as the wood and the leafy shoots hardly any.

Our native rubber may be substituted for the foreign in many articles and is even said to be superior to the foreign where used in the manufacture of shoe soles, tires and other articles with a wearing surface.

The United States uses three-fourths of the world's supply of rubber, valued at nearly $500,000,000, but raises little. Native rubber is a growing industry. Each year finds an increased acreage, although it is attracting little public interest outside of Arizona. It is doubtful if the United States can ever supply the domestic rubber market, but in the meantime the seed required for the acreage now planned must come from the unirrigated Mystery Ranch of Escondido.

For the so-called "Mystery Ranch" is a guayule seed farm.

UNDECIDED BETWEEN HORSE AND TRACTOR

BY M. L. SALVAGE

BEAUMONT.—Up to the present time the tractor for orchard work has not come into very general use in this district. There are a few tractor owners who use them exclusively for plowing, cultivating and furrowing out. They seem to be well pleased with their machines so far, while, on the other hand, the owners of horse and mule teams are equally satisfied with the old kind of power. The fact that one tractor can do three or four times as much of the same kind of work as a team of animals, makes it a desirable machine for the busy [illegible] look after. [illegible] some orchards here where [illegible] cannot be handled to an advantage [illegible] the tractor [illegible] to the sloping hillsides or [illegible] sections. Then there are spots rocky [illegible] left here and there by the tractor [illegible] and strictly a man with a team or one-horse [illegible] can work out satisfactorily.

The controversy concerning expenses and upkeep, like all other problems along this line, is largely one of the individual owner or driver. One man will run his machine for years with no other expense than the oil and fuel, while another, with the same make of machine, will have to have it overhauled by a skilled mechanic every so often. The man with the team, of course, has to keep the animals busy all the time, to earn the cost of their daily feed, yet there is some return in the fertilizer that every owner must consider as a valuable asset.

As the grower tries to keep his trees growing low, for several good reasons, the great trouble with tractors here so far is that they are too high off the ground. Either the wheels are too high to pass under and close to the trees, or the seat is so high that the driver cannot get under the low limbs easily. In the winter the tractor can be used to better advantage than when the fruit is growing fast and the limbs are heavily laden and bending over near the ground. If the tractor is crowded up under the trees it will knock off much fruit. This is especially the case with apples. This objection, however, also applies to a team of large horses or mules. The animal next to the tree soon learns to pull in under the low hanging limbs to brush off the flies and in doing so shatters a great deal of fruit, more even than the tractor will.

There are several owners with teams of small mules who think they have the ideal power for all kinds of work in the orchards, but they only have small orchards and are not pushed to the limit for time during the cultivating season.

FOREIGN COMPETITION

According to the California Almond Growers' Association, American Almond Growers will still have the competition of the foreign grown product. In spite of the new duty, the importing houses can supply almonds at the same prices as before, it is declared, the reason being that the tariff differential is absorbed by a lower foreign market price, due to large crops of good quality. The importer, and not the consumer, will pocket the loss, the Association states.

DEMONSTRATIONS AND PRACTICE FEATURED

The Agricultural Extension Service Tractor School, which opens at Covina tomorrow, has been planned to give a maximum amount of practical experience in the various phases of tractor handling, and to treat the ordinary problems that come up. Many serious tractor troubles, the extension experts declare, can be avoided if they are recognized soon enough, and a great deal of time and effort can be saved during [illegible]

One of the important activities of the course will be tractor overhauling. Members enrolling are privileged to bring their own tractors to the school, to be overhauled under the supervision of the instructor in charge. The instructor points out the things that need to be done and the owner may carry out such of these instructions as he may desire. He picks his own crew from the members taking the course, and they, in co-operation with him, do the actual work, being constantly directed by the instructor. Last year, at the Los Angeles County School, twelve tractors were overhauled in this manner.

The general principles of gas-engine operation and repairing apply to other farm motors than tractors. In Southern California many small-power engines are used for spraying and pumping. Work with such engines will also be featured and members enrolling in the course will be allowed to bring in engines to the school for repairs and overhauling. This, it is believed, will afford an unusual opportunity for orchardists to become familiar with their smaller power units and the principles of operation.

All tools and equipment will be provided by the instructor in charge. The classes will meet at 9 and continue until 5 o'clock each day, for the five days of the course. course.

To provide for those wishing to take the course, there will be five instructors instead of four as last year.

The Orange County Tractor School will be held during the week of January 29-February 3, at Anaheim. Enrollments for this school should be made at the office of the Orange County Farm Adviser, 508 North Main street, Santa Ana.

Perris Valley's "Hunch"

allows them to make their crop, and get it mature by the time frost comes. Under this system there is not the loss from falling squares which was experienced at first in the valley.

The introduction of Acala cotton has proved very fortunate. Its season is shorter by at least two weeks than that of Durango and its yield is heavier, while it is much easier to pick. While Durango brings a slightly greater price in the market, the cost of producing a pound of Acala is so much less that the net profit per acre is considerably greater. Mr. Talbot states that Acala gins a heavier percentage of lint to the gross weight of the pick than any other variety, that grown by the Liberty Ranch running 37 per cent lint.

While of course the lint is the chief thing sought in growing cotton, the seed, a by-product, is not to be despised. The cattle [illegible] producing the crop, leaving the lint as profit. But by far the greater part of the seed produced last year is being kept for this year's planting. One grower, [illegible] et, this year planted only enough to make him one 500-pound bale of lint. He took all his seed home, saying that next year he would put it all back into the ground, because he has been so well pleased with his experiment.

The introduction and successful establishment of this new crop in that part of Southern California lying west of the mountains are of importance to the whole State. They ultimately mean heavy traffic through our ports, as already the whole output, even though as yet it is negligible in bulk, goes to the compress at San Pedro. But it is of supreme importance to the Perris Valley, because it can be successfully produced with a fraction of the water required by most crops, and here water is scarce and expensive.

Invest in a McCormick-Deering Manure Spreader for More Profitable Farming

The basis of profitable farming is a fertile soil. In farming, as in other businesses, there are poor years and good ones, but the farmer who keeps up the productivity of his soil will forge ahead.

No method of maintaining soil fertility has proved so efficient as the proper application of barnyard manure. It is a foresighted policy to build up crop yields with a McCormick-Deering Manure Spreader. Put manure on your fields finely, evenly, uniformly, and economically; the extra fertility will in a short time pay for the McCormick-Deering spreader.

Note again these features in McCormick-Deering construction: 1. Power delivered from both wheels. 2. Double ratchet drive with six feed speeds. 3. Short-turn front axle—no pole whipping. 4. Rear wheels track with front wheels. 5. Tight bottom. 6. Two beaters and wide-spread spiral. 7. All-steel main frame.

The photographs, taken in the Beaumont-Banning district, are typical winter scenes of the "mountain apple" regions of Riverside and San Bernardino counties. The different orchardists have their own ideas as to the best form of power for their operations, but the crops that come from the highland country seem to indicate that both the flesh and bone and the steel horses are doing their work efficiently and well.

Necessity for High Production on Valuable Fruit Lan

(With Photographs Illustrating the "Long Pruning" System as Advocated a

By V. F. BLANCHARD, Assistant Farm Advi

DORMANCY for deciduous fruit trees has arrived and pruning is under way. Pruning is a subject which is always of interest to fruit growers, although it appears to many to be a rather mysterious horticultural practice. It is not so mysterious, however, when the principles involved are understood and this requires a knowledge of the growth responses which follow different pruning treatments.

It used to be considered that, in California, the pruning of deciduous trees was fully understood, and that the system of pruning as formerly practiced was thoroughly satisfactory. Perhaps it was in the early days when land was cheap and nursery stock, labor and other costs were correspondingly low. But conditions have changed and we have today high land values and high costs all around. Hence the necessity for adopting methods that will insure the best possible returns.

About four years ago the horticultural experts at the college of agriculture announced that investigations in pruning had brought to light the fact that the old California, open vase, heading-back system of pruning was not so satisfactory as a new system which had been developed in the course of pruning investigations then underway. The new system, which is essentially a thinning system, but which is popularly known now as the "long" system, has since that time been demonstrated and brought to the attention of the fruit growers of the State by the college of agriculture through its Extension Service, now established in some forty counties. Pruning plots by the hundreds have been established with the two systems demonstrated side by side for comparison.

The investigations in pruning have shown a number of things about pruning which were not known before. What takes place within a tree when it is undergoing a certain pruning treatment is now better understood. Before, it was largely guess work. It has been shown that when the tops of a tree are cut off each year there is less growth than when one merely thins the tree so that sunlight can penetrate to all parts. Before, the grower was deceived in thinking that length growth, resulting from heading back, was an indication of vigor and fruitfulness.

WHY DO WE PRUNE?

It is commonly thought that we prune to build strong trees and to produce large crops of fruit. Pruning does not mean that, primarily, but it does mean three things: first, the regulation of fruit production (numerically;) second, the proper distribution of fruit throughout the tree and, third, a renewal of fruit wood and spurs to provide for regular bearing. We do not prune to get a large amount of fruit, for no pruning at all will accomplish that.

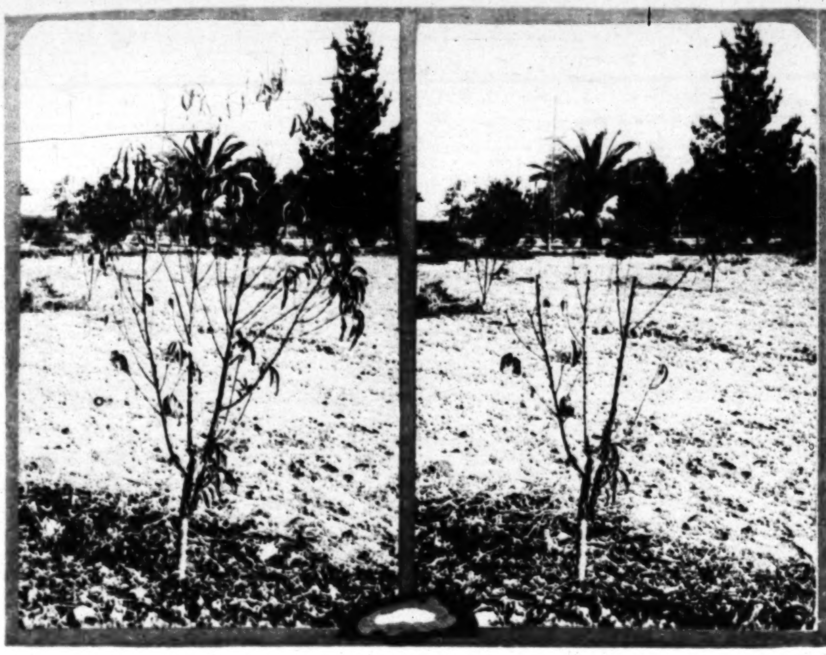
To illustrate why we prune let us take three trees. Let us consider that the first one is not pruned at all, that the second is pruned by opening it up so that sunlight can penetrate to all parts, but with no cutting back of the tops; and that the third is pruned more severely by cutting back the tops and thinning out as is done with the old heading-back system. It is found that the unpruned trees produces more fruit buds than either of the other two: the thinned three has less than the first tree, but more than the headed-back tree. So it can be seen that more fruit is produced by an unpruned tree than by one not pruned, and that the more severely one prunes, the less fruit is produced. Unfortunately the unpruned tree produces poor quality fruit and the headed-back one, on an average, does not produce enough to make it commercially profitable. The thinned tree comes nearer the ideal.

As for distribution of the fruit throughout each tree, it is found that the unpruned tree has its fruit mostly in the top and on the outside; the thinned tree has its fruit well distributed throughout all parts, and the headed-back tree has its fruit in clusters just below the cuts in the top (usually out of reach with old trees.) So pruning can accomplish a proper distribution of fruit.

In regard to fruit wood renewal, the unpruned tree has its fruit wood shaded out on the inside and its fruit is only produced in the tops and sides where sunlight can strike; the thinned tree is able to produce and retain fruit wood because sunlight reaches all parts; the headed-back tree has its fruit wood shaded out because the tree is so dense that sunlight cannot penetrate to the interior. Proper pruning can also accomplish a renewal of fruit wood.

FIRST YEAR'S PRUNING

When a tree comes from the nursery it is a straight whip, usually with side branches. If the side branches are sufficiently well matured, some of them can be selected for main limbs, but it is exceptional to have such side branches mature enough.



A well-formed peach tree (left.) Note ideal spacing of main limbs on trunk. The tree is ready for the first fall pruning. Right—Same tree after first fall pruning. Each limb is headed at a height of about four feet to force a further division of two more limbs on each of the three framework limbs the following spring.

Left—An eight-year-old apricot tree ready for the third season's pruning with the "long" system. It produced 300 pounds of fruit in the 1922 season, even after half the fruit had been removed in the thinning process. The average for the orchard was eleven tons per acre. Above—Same apricot tree after pruning. Note the few main leaders and the good lateral fruiting branch system. The top is open sufficiently to let sunlight penetrate even when in full leaf. years with the "long" system. Note excellent rs throughout the tree. This is the result of rs and of much thinning to let sunlight in. ee after pruning. Note degree of thinning oved.

Using the long-handled hook shears.

Usually the best practice is to cut off all the side branches, leaving a straight whip. These should not be cut so close that the buds will be killed. The trunk should be cut off at a height of from 24 to 30 inches.

The tree should then be painted with whitewash to prevent sunburn. Tree protectors are undesirable, as they prevent a proper spacing of main lambs.

In May select three shoots for the first framework limbs, one at the top, a second seven or eight inches below and forming an angle of 120 degrees, and a third seven or eight inches below the second. All other shoots should have their terminals pinched off, leaving three or four leaves to protect the trunk from sunburn and to manufacture an added amount of plant food to enable the tree to get an early start. That is the first spring's treatment.

The first fall's treatment is to cut off the tops of each of the three limbs at a height of from four to four and one-half feet from the ground, and to thin the lower wood where there is too much. This applies for all deciduous truit trees.

In May of the second year select two shoots on each of the three limbs to serve as main leaders. Pinch back the terminals of the other shoots to suppress length growth. Six main leaders are thus grown.

The second fall's pruning is to thin out the tree sufficiently to let sunlight penetrate to all parts. The amount of pruning will depend upon the vigor of the tree and the density. Above all principles the most important one to bear in mind is that leaves only function in the presence of sunlight; therefore, thin enough. More harm results from insufficient opening up than from too much of it.

PRUNING BEARING TREES

The principles for the pruning of mature trees are just the same as those for pruning young trees beyond the second year. One should train the six main leaders so that there is a well-developed lateral branch system for fruit production. Different kinds of trees are somewhat different in their manner of growth and, consequently, the treatments vary accordingly. But generally the principles of pruning for one kind of tree are the same as for another.

Apricots and plums are similar in their character of growth. Train six main leaders with a subsystem of lateral branches, some of which arise at forked unions, while others grow from below and are more pendant. Great care should be exercised in opening up enough. It is desirable to have an open center, but do not open to such an extent that the leaders are forced outward too much. It is better to practice opening up uniformly throughout the tree than too much in one place. While the tree is young the leaders should be more erect. Hanging branches should be encouraged, for they hold up great amounts of fruit. Never cut back a branch unless it is to a lateral sufficiently large to prevent length growth. Cutting back the tops should never be practiced. Apricots bear their fruit on first, second and third-year wood. They have a characteristic of forming fruit spurs.

Peaches are different from other trees in that they produce their fruit on one-year-old wood only. It is therefore necessary to encourage new wood development. Old pruners used to cut back the tops to get this new wood, but by so doing the very best of the fruit buds were always removed. Opening up the peach tree so that sunlight will penetrate to all parts will provide plenty of new wood. The essential thing is to prune out enough. A peach tree should never have forked branches left in the leaders, for breakage will surely result and lower fruit wood become shaded out. Remove all upright growth and leave only the pendant or drooping type. In order to prevent excessive fruiting and to accomplish part of the fruit-thinning during the pruning season, while one is not so rushed for time, thin out the fruit wood heavily.

Pears and apples are more upright in their manner of growth. Only five or six main leaders should be allowed to grow. Thin out the smaller upright growth sufficiently to let sunlight in. When one branch hangs over another, remove one of them.

It should be borne in mind by all fruit growers that pruning will not accomplish everything. Thinning of fruit, wire bracing or propping, irrigation and other horticultural operations are all equally important.

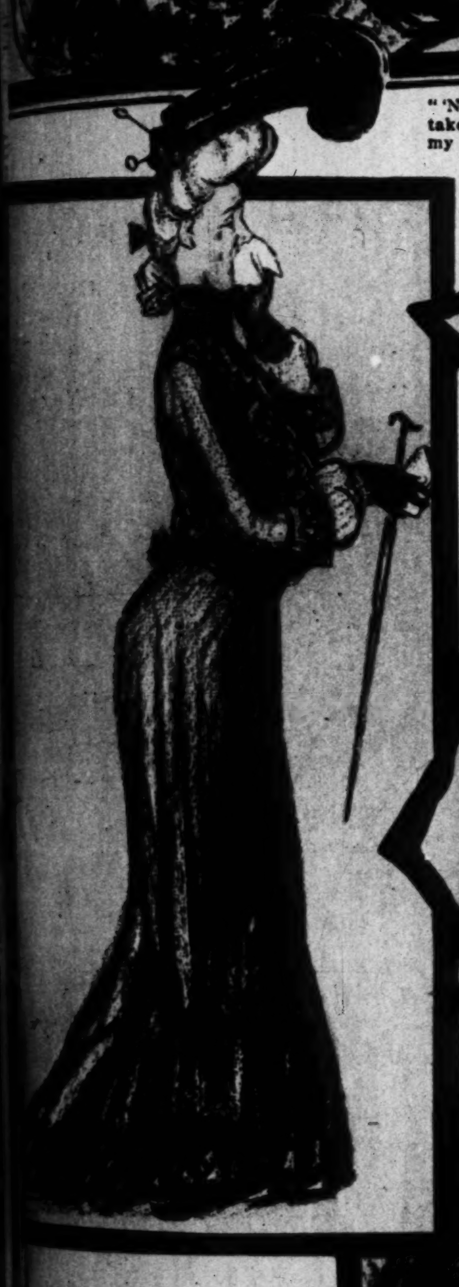
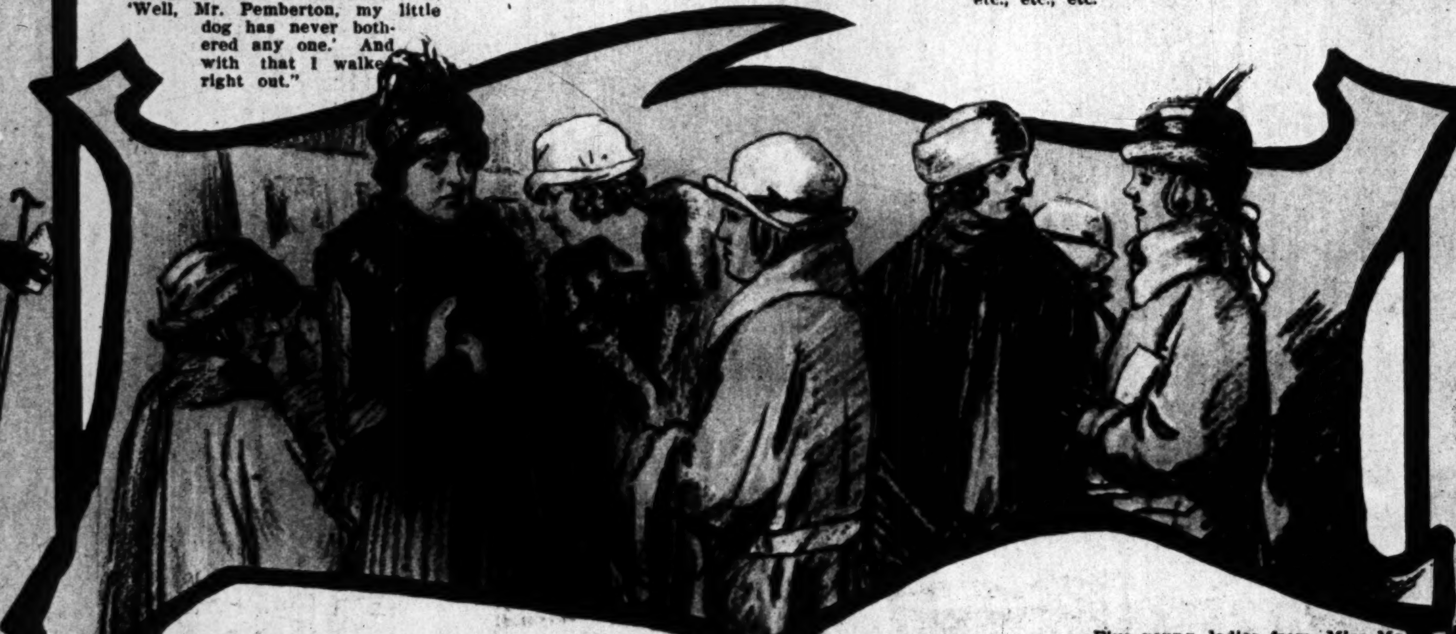
"'Now Mr. Pemberton,' I said, 'either I take my little dog on tour, or I'll hand in my notice. 'Oh, all right,' he says, just like that, 'you can leave Saturday night.' Well, my dear, I'm sorry now I didn't just tell him what I thought of him! But all I said was, 'Well, Mr. Pemberton, my little dog has never bothered any one.' And with that I walked right out."

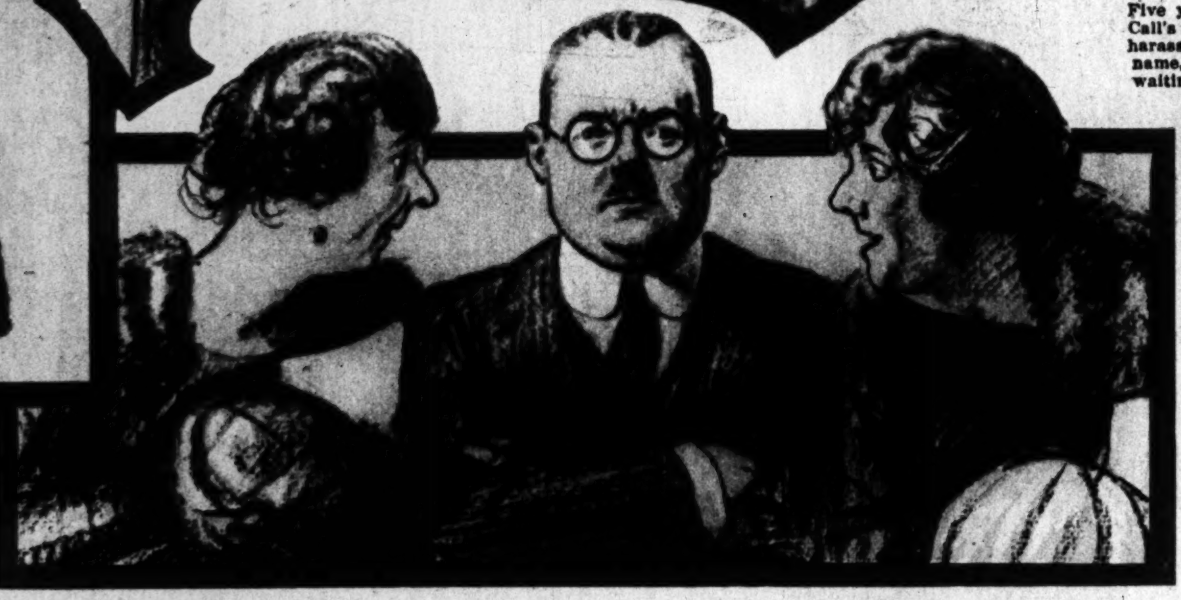
Any play at any theater for Julia, as long as it has one of the three Barrymores in it.

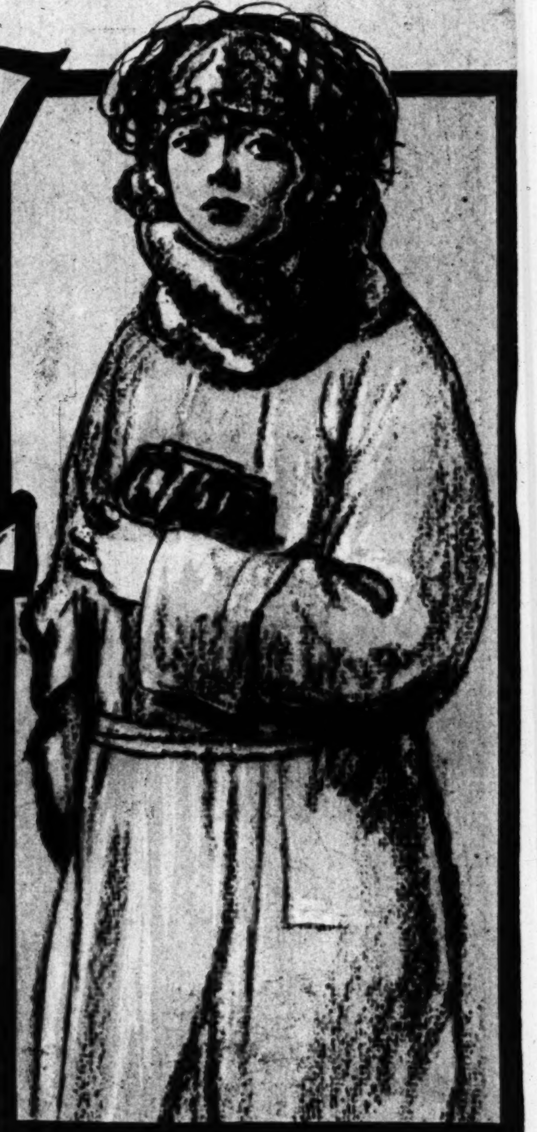
The late arrival. "But my dear, I'm perfectly sure you told me to meet you in the lobby of the Casino Theater. I'm positive you said the Casino because I remember at the time thinking it was funny, because I was almost sure that 'Sweet Papa' was playing here at this theater."—etc., etc., etc.





Five young ladies from Miss McCall's select academy, and one harassed teacher, Miss Roblee by name, of the English department—waiting in the lobby. They are waiting for Doris Perkins, who has been taken shopping by her mother. Miss Roblee knows from experience that about 3:20 p.m. Doris and Mama will arrive breathless, with just enough strength left to cry out, "So sorry, but we thought you told us to wait on the corner instead of here! !"

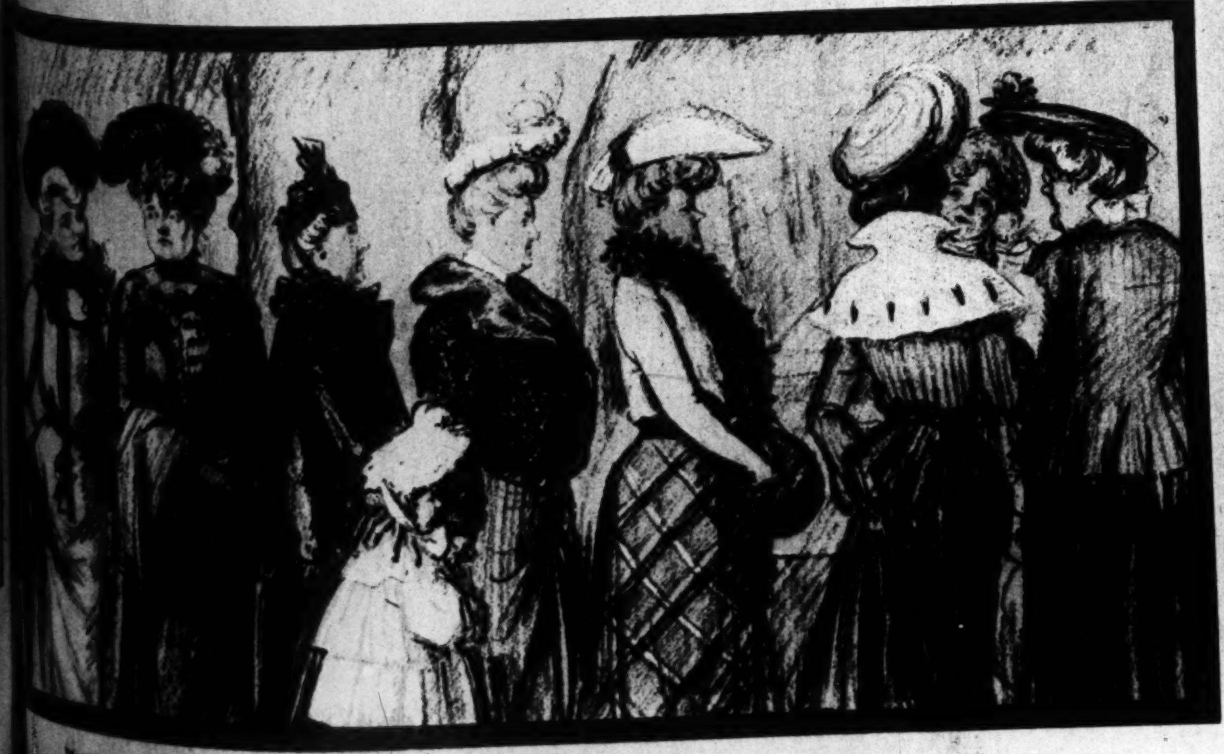




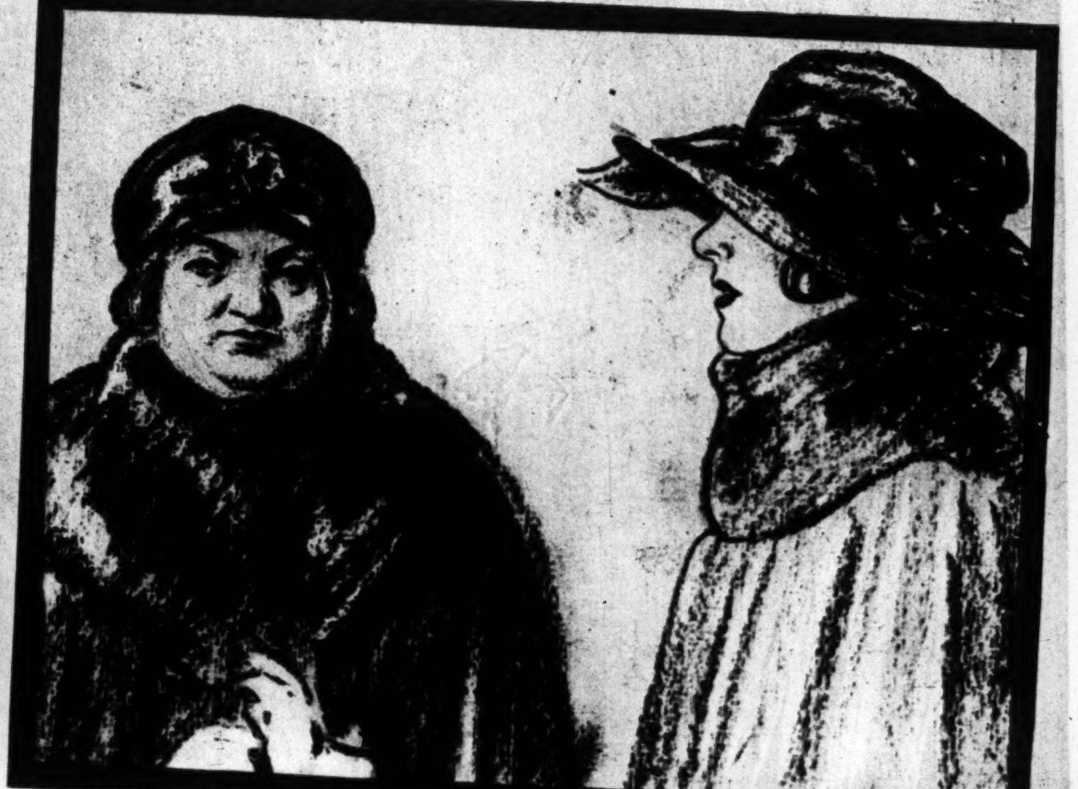
Like everything else these days the matinee girl has changed, too. Time was when the Wednesday matinee girls loved a good sob fest better than anything else. And then gradually it got to be the fashion for people to say there was enough misery in real life without going to the theater for it, and all that. And now, would you believe it, young ladies go to the matinee to laugh. But many there are who will sigh for the old days, when a girl was wont to boast about how she cried for a week after seeing Olga Nethersole in "Sappho." The blonde in black, shown here, is feeling her way out of the theater after seeing Mrs. Carter in "Du Barry."

"My dear, did you go to Clara Button's wedding?" "Her wedding! Why, I didn't know she was engaged even!" "Well, did you ever! !" and so on. You see three minutes before the rise of the curtain, Mrs. Ruggles discovers, across a perfectly strange man, her dear friend, Mrs. Berry from Joplin, and they just have to talk over old times all through Act One.

Bessie has just spent a wonderful afternoon at the movies seeing Gloria Swansdowne in "Burnt Embers."



Matinees aren't what they once were. No siree! Along in the early nineteen hundreds, when the ten, twenty and thirties were rampant, every matinee girl in the 30-cent seats was invited to attend, on Friday afternoon, after the curtain had fallen on the last act of "The Banker's Daughter," a pink tea on the stage where the members of the company would be delighted to shake the hand of "each and every lady."



The post mortem after the matinee. "But Mama, it's just a fantasy, a Barrie fantasy! It isn't meant to be exciting!" Just the same, Mrs. Blum is unconvinced. Give her a mystery play.

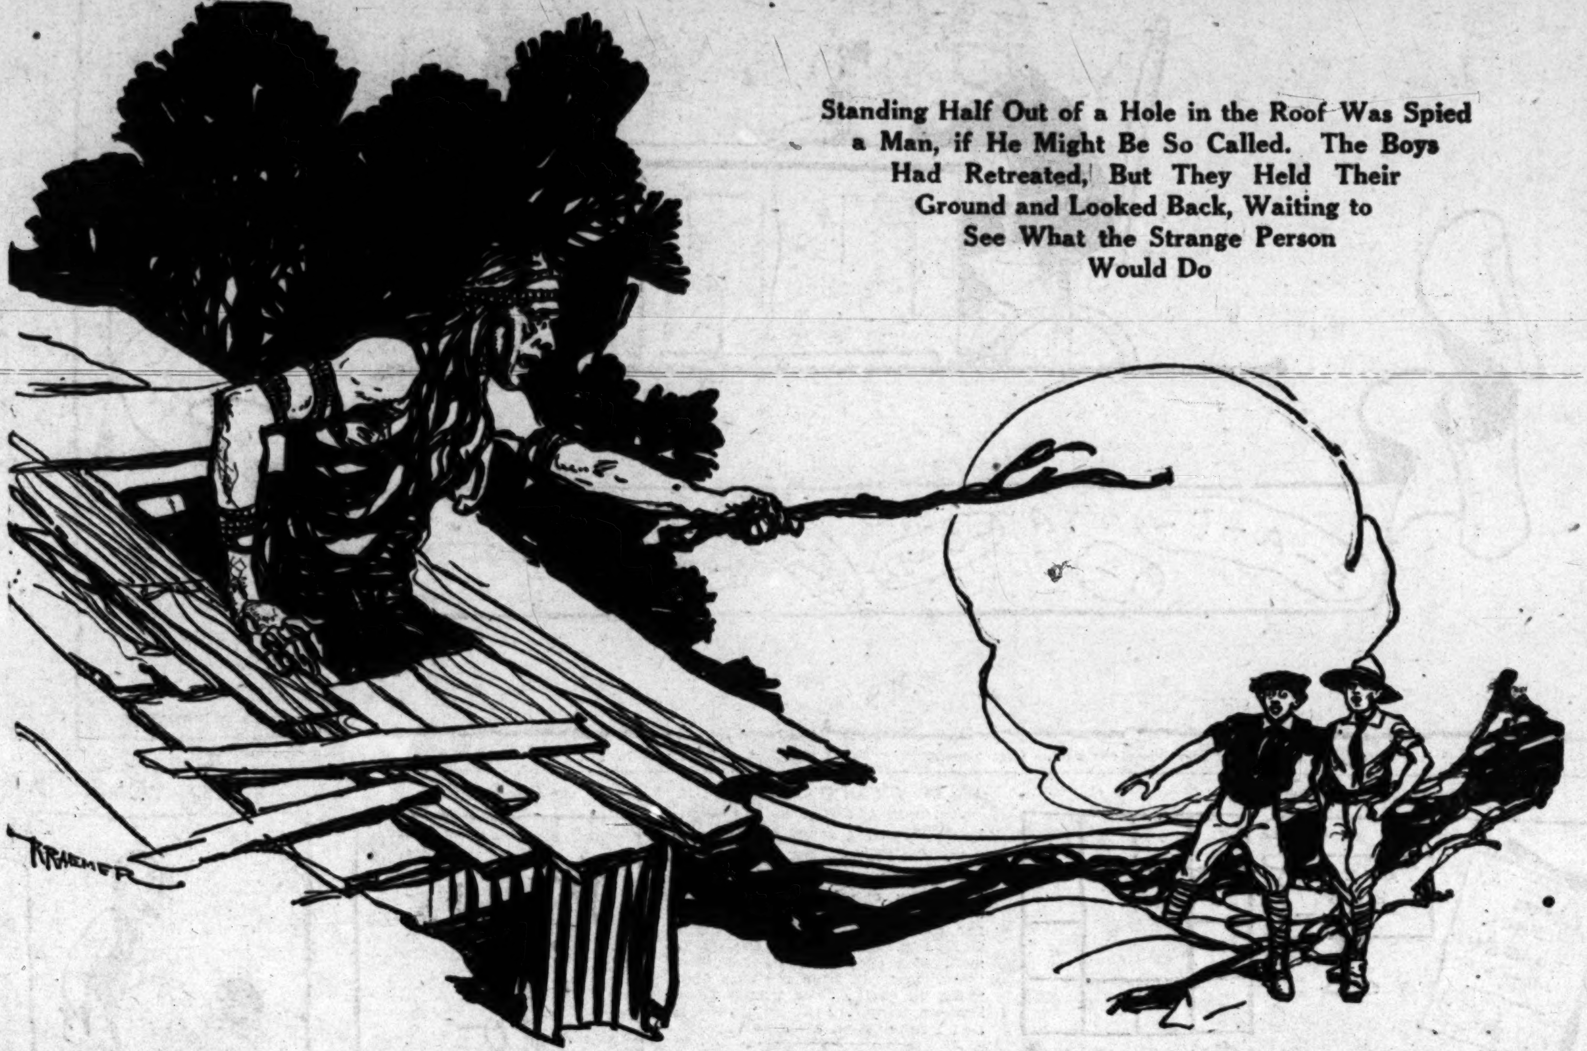
King Geezer of Goose Lake

BY FRANK A. SECORD

Being the Adventures of Two Boys Who Encountered a Strange Being Who Believed He Was the Monarch of One of the Loneliest Spots in the Country, and Who Had for His Subjects What He Honestly Thought Were Reptiles



Standing Half Out of a Hole in the Roof Was Spied a Man, if He Might Be So Called. The Boys Had Retreated, But They Held Their Ground and Looked Back, Waiting to See What the Strange Person Would Do

No man has lived here in years, they say," Harvey Wells remarked as he and his companion, Dale Hart, put the finishing touches on camp and surveyed their surroundings. Some apple trees hung full of fruit; a lot of half-wild chickens scattered at the approach of the strangers; two animals, half-dog, half-coyote, slunk away to hide under a tumbledown barn.

Sand burrs were everywhere.

Peering into a ramshackle house the boys saw nothing to indicate the presence of a human being; but when they stepped upon an old rickety porch the buzzing of hundreds of rattlesnakes startled them.

"Wow!" exclaimed Harvey. "It seems we are not very welcome. The place is alive with them!"

"Rattlers, wild chickens, wild dogs, sand burrs and alkali!" muttered Dale. "We sure picked a wild spot to come to and all we need to set it off right is a wild man."

The boys carefully retreated to a very bare spot of alkali ground, from which they looked back at the shack, for the rattling grew until it seemed that the very air was alive with busy-tailed snakes. Standing half out of a hole in the roof was spied a man, if he might be so called. This weird specimen of humanity, evidently a demented relic of a civilization which once flourished there, waved both arms vigorously and shouted:

"I am besieged by enemies! Beware, the snakes of Frenchman's Flats!"

As the boys gazed upon the man he disappeared and presently creaking boards indicated his coming. Harvey and Dale were husky lads and when the old man appeared again, bearing no weapon, they concluded to stand their ground until something more alarming happened.

In the door of the rookery the weird fellow stood waving his arms. He was dressed in clothing made from old gunny sacks; his hair hung fully four feet down his back and it was generously knotted with sand burrs; whiskers all over his face appeared to have never been cut since the time of the first man on earth.

About the weird fellow's head was wrapped a band of snakeskins and when he walked, his every movement caused a jingling of hundreds of rattles taken from reptiles. His arms were bespangled with the same uncanny things and now the boys understood why they apparently heard so many rattlers a while before.

"Listen!" shrilly shouted the stranger, dancing and again violently waving his arms, "Do you hear the music of my friends?"

"We came here to fish!" Harvey managed to blurt, not knowing what else to say.

"Fish! There are no fish here!" the man angrily cried. "The lake is full of snakes. Snakes—do you hear? Leave the broad, fertile lands of the king!"

"Fertile lands!" Dale laughed, for he now believed he was dealing with a simple and harmless lunatic, "king! Show me the king!"

"Look you upon my royal robes and tremble" came the answer.

The lads grinned, whereupon the "king" rapped himself on the forehead with a fist and muttered something about his throne.

"You struck it," Dale agreed. "You are a king and your throne is in your head. I bow, mighty monarch. For all you know we are ambassadors from the Land of the Big Gazook, come to pay you homage."

The king pretended not to hear. His eyes took a queer expression and he dreamily muttered, "My land!" and then, striding to the lake, spoke some unintelligible words, set every rattle on his body to making a noise by shaking himself, and then roared in a voice that struck terror for the time to both boys, "My enemies have sent me that which I have longed for these many centuries. Oh, lake, this day you shall receive food for my beloved snakes!" And then the king hastily departed to his castle—the dilapidated old house—and was seen no more for a time.

"Well," Harvey whispered to Dale, "This looks bad He is not to be sneezed at, this king. What do you make of it?"

"That he evidently means to make bait of us and throw the bits into the lake. Wonder what kind of snakes he keeps in Goose Lake."

"Wild man—king—no matter what—I intend to fish in that lake and find out!" Harvey declared grimly. "I don't say we will tarry here two weeks as intended, but I bet we will not run!"

"Run!" Dale cried, insulted at the word. "Say, my great, great, great grandfather's first name was Plymouth and that's a rock which never has been shaken yet throughout centuries!"

The boys armed themselves and brought their horses nearer camp, the while watching the old rookery where the crazy man disappeared.

As the crow flies it is the longest forty-five miles ever driven by team—and an automobile cannot make the trip at all—from the nearest railroad point to Goose Lake in the sandhills of Western Nebraska, snuggled among alkali wastes. Long ago people attempted to farm the country, failed and left without bothering about taking many of their belongings. Seldom does man visit the vicinity. It is known that in other years the State stocked the big body of water with game fish and this knowledge it was that lured the two boys to the spot.

"The old geezer says the lake is full of snakes," Dale mused. "He sure wears enough rattles of land reptiles and if he's got a colony of moccasins in the water I'm not going to wade out there to cast for game fish!"

Rising out of the earth the king appeared. He did rise out of the earth in fact for, from a sort of tunnel hole he crawled and it was evident that the tunnel ran clear to the house in the distance. He heard the remark and cried, "The king is a geezer. Ah, long have I waited to hear the word Geezer—geezer! How musical!"

Dale bowed low, he moved his cap and folding it across his breast, spoke:

"Geezer—most worthy king of Frenchman's Flats—I salute you. What ho!" addressing an imaginary audience, "Approach, minions, and salute King Geezer!"

To the astonishment of both boys at that instant there occurred a lashing of objects in the water of the lake. The king stood at the side of a tree, waving his arms and rattling his snake charms. Whether his actions caused the strange manifestation or not, the lads did not then know.

"Look upon my beloved snakes!" the crazy man exclaimed. "See them salute King Geezer.

It happened that between the sun and the water the boys observed a strange cloud resembling one of dust although there was no wind. The cloud lowered and was seen no more. The lashing of thousands of squirming things in Goose Lake sent creepy sensations down the backs of the visitors who turned to seek information from the man, but he was gone.

"Well!" gasped Dale. "King Geezer seems to know what he is talking about. When you speak about his minions he shows us, all right. He's got them out yonder in the water, even if he has none on shore."

As suddenly as the water was

TERING UPON "OUR BIRTHDAY"

HAT BOY SCOUTS STAND FOR AND BODY'S GROWTH DETAILED

BY E. B. DEGROOT.

We, the Boy Scouts of America, were officially born Feb. 8, 1910. n June 5, 1916, the Congress of the United States of America granted us a Federal charter which in effect patented our name, uniform, badges and other symbols and insignia. On Feb. 8, 1923, we shall enter upon our thirteenth birthday. Those who are superstitious dread the umber thirteen in any connection. ut we are not superstitious; either are we alarmed about the growing pains" that are said to vertake boys in their teens. rowth is the law of life and we re so much alive that we are today he biggest and strongest boy oranization in the world.

E. B. DeGroot

And just to show that "that's othin'" we are going to celebrate ur thirteenth birthday by telling he world that the little bunch hich the Congress of the United tates incorporated in 1916 has rown in membership to one-half illion Boy Scouts.

Every council in the country is ow engaged in a campaign to exend the privileges of the Boy couts of America to a greater umber of boys. Southern Caliornia has guaranteed an increase f no less than 25 per cent for each f the local councils. Every scout ho reads these lines should join in his campaign. Let each scout dopt as his final good turn before he twelfth year of scouting ends, he bringing in of one new boy. ring him into the troop and help im master the tenderfoot requireents.

Exactly at 8:15 o'clock on the ight of our birthday, February , we are all going to stand in our everal troop headquarters and reedicate ourselves to the purpose of iving up to our code as expressed n the scout oath: "On my honor will do my best—(1) to do my uty to God and my country and o obey the scout law; (2) to help ther people at all times; (3) to eep myself physically strong, nentally awake and morally traight," and again in the scout aw: "A scout is trustworthy, loyal, elpful, friendly, courteous, kind, bedient, cheerful, thrifty, brave, lean and reverent." That's the ay we are going to celebrate our hirteenth birthday. Can you beat t, you fellows who are not yet Boy couts, or you grown-up men who idn't have the advantages we enoy under the banner of the B. S. A. f the U. S. A.?

LIFE GUARD RECORD

Eighteen persons owe their lives o the Boy Scout Life Guard diision of Morgantown, W. Va., hich was on duty last summer at he municipal bathing beaches on he Monongahela and the Cheat ivers, and in addition eleven other ersons who had become exausted in the water were towed o shore by the scouts.

Five of these saved from drownng are debtors to Scout Lowell avis. Three he saved in the Moongahela and two in the Cheat. couts Herman Erd and Barnard Moon each saved three lives on the ononghela. Four other men owe heir lives to Scouts Leland Pyle nd Frank Lepera.

EAGLE SCOUT IS CHAMPION

Training received in working up o eagle scout hank has played s part in the preparation of more han one boy for future championship. A case in point is Wiliam Cox, eagle and veteran scout f Troop No. 11, Rochester, N. Y., inner of the Columbia University nterscholastic and the Yale interscholastic cross-country meets. Cox as been very active in scouting nd is still registered with the roop.

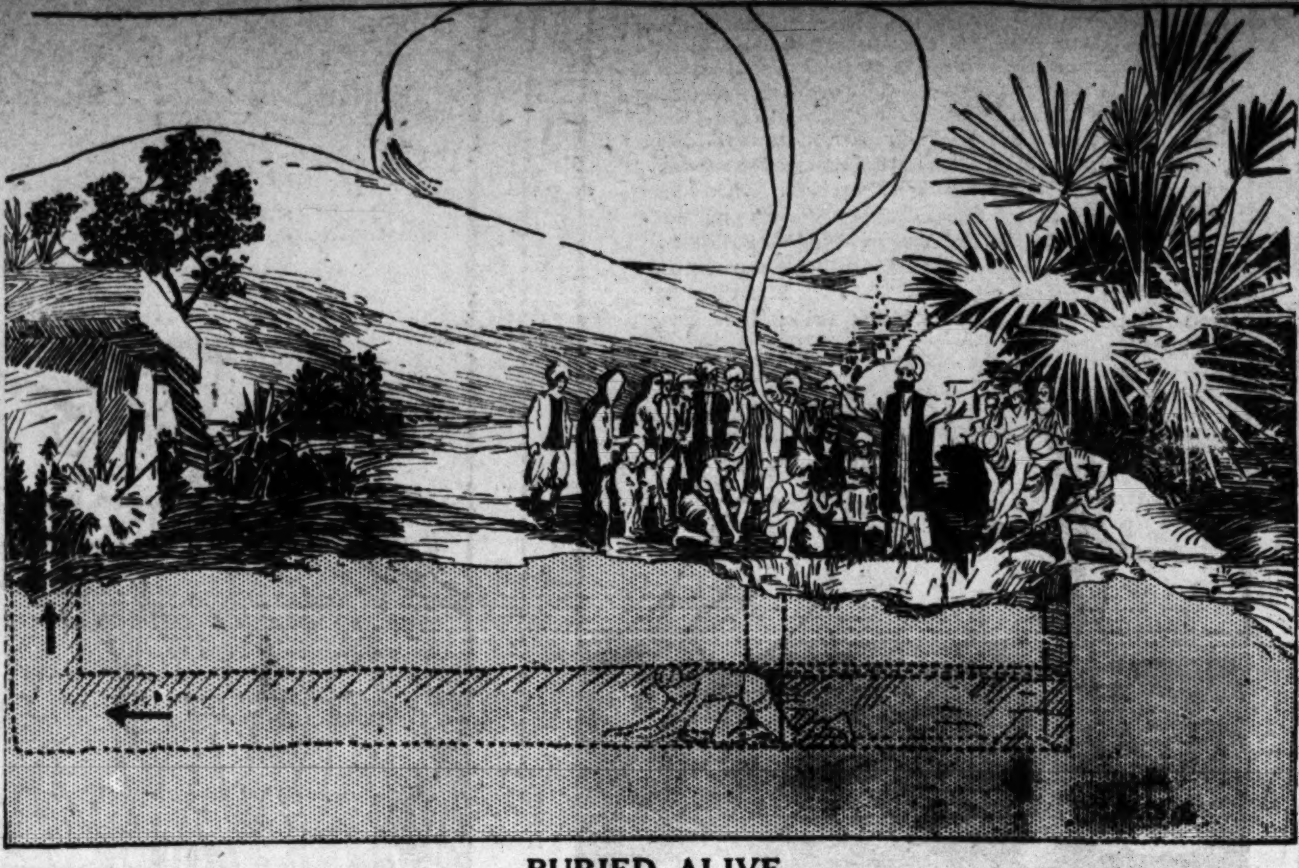
MIRACLES—Ancient and Modern

BY W. B. GIBSON



BURIED ALIVE

Among the many hypnotic feats employed by the Hindu adepts, the living burial stands out as the most remarkable. The stoicism of Buddhist fanatics who allow themselves to suffer all kinds of pain, is well known. But the actual burial of a living person, who is interred for several days and then removed and restored to life, is the faster feat of them all.

It is said by many authoritative investigators that the living burial has, on several occasions, been genuinely exhibited by actually placing the subject in a deep hypnotic trance, in which he needs no air, food or drink. The "miracle," however, is a great money-making proposition to its exhibitors, especially when wealthy Europeans are present to observe the phenomenon, and the wily fakirs are not loath to work the wonder by trickery and fraud when they see a chance of pecuniary profit. Moreover, the fraudulent method is so much easier than the genuine that it is safe to say the majority of the exhibitions are swindles.

The living burials are usually staged in the smaller towns in India. A local "miracle worker" announces that he will attempt the exhibition, and when a crowd has assembled, he orders a large hole to be dug in the ground. A subject is chosen and placed under "hypnotic" influence. His inert body is lowered, in a rough wooden casket, into the deep grave and the earth is piled over the coffin. The fakir then remains near the grave for several days and a constant watch is kept by townspeople to see that the earth is not disturbed. When the appointed day arrives the coffin is dug up and the body removed exactly as buried. The trance is dispelled and the subject restored to life and health, showing no ill effects from his interment.

The "miracle" is worked very easily, but as it requires a great deal of secret preparation, it is always presented in an obscure place. The fakir and his confederates previously dig an underground passage from a hut near the chosen spot. The passage is just large enough for a man to crawl through and the entrance from the hut is carefully concealed.

When the grave is dug care is taken to see that it comes just at the end of the blind passage. The end of the coffin is loose, and as soon as the large box has had a little earth thrown upon it the "subject," who is, of course, a confederate, loses no time in waking from his pretended trance. He removes the end of the box and digs his way through the thin wall of earth separating him from the concealed passage. Thus he makes his escape through the tunnel itno the nearby hut.

While the watch is being kept over the grave the subject quietly spends his time outside. He is usually removed from the hut under cover of darkness so that he will be far enough away from the actual scene to prevent recognition by any one who may enter the hut. The secret opening inside the hut is walled up to keep it from the eyes of every one.

The subject remains outside the grave until the appointed time, which may be as far in the future as the fakir chooses. When the day has arrived the subject reenters the hut, and when the people start to dig up the coffin, quickly makes his return through the tunnel. As his confinement will be for only a few minutes, he knocks down plenty of loose earth at the coffin end of the passage, and taking his place in the coffin, tightens up the loose end. The coffin is always a large one, allowing ample room in which its occupant may work.

As soon as the coffin is raised from the grave one of the diggers, a confederate of the fakir, dumps back a lot of loose dirt, which fills the lower part of the grave formerly occupied by the coffin, and thus the presence of the secret tunnel is effectually concealed.

In the meantime the fakir is "dehypnotizing" his "subject," a procedure that is watched with breathless amazement by all the spectators. Of course he experiences little difficulty in restoring the buried man to life, and every one is filled with astonishment at the healthy appearance of the victim, who apparently has suffered nothing from his long confinement.

The wily fakir usually lets the "miracle" rest for some months until he again sees a profitable opportunity for exhibiting it. Often he will use the same place again, thus saving the trouble of digging a new passage. Instead of giving a suspicious inkling of the real secret, the use of the same spot is regarded as an almost historic act, and the ground near the hut becomes a recognized graveyard for living persons.

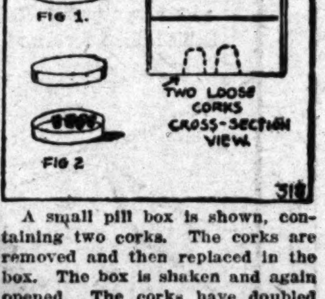
MULTIPLYING CORKS



A small pill box is shown, containing two corks. The corks are removed and then replaced in the box. The box is shaken and again opened. The corks have doubled in number; there are now four inside the box.

The cover of the box is just like the bottom, a peculiarity of nearly all pill boxes. Two corks are glued to the inside of the cover of the box (Fig. 1) which is removed without disclosing the inside. Two loose corks are dropped in the box. In shaking the box it is turned over and the bottom is removed instead of the top. No one will notice the change, as the top and the bottom are exactly alike. Four corks will then be seen when the bottom is removed.

Every other letter in this quotation has been omitted. Can you supply them and get the sentence? For the answer see The Junior Times next Sunday.

THE USUAD REQUEST

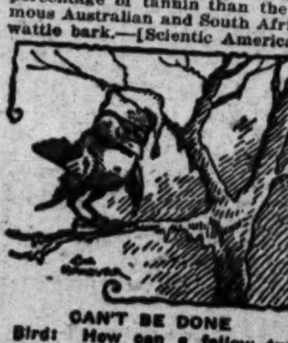
Uncle Theodore, who was visiting, wished to talk to Mary's father at his office. He could not find the telephone directory, and thus appealed to the 4-year-old Mary for information regarding the 'phone number: "Mary what does mother ask for when she talks to daddy at his office?" he inquired. Mary, who was wise for her years, replied. "Money."

THREE GOOD TURNS

Scouts of Logan City, Utah, are public-spirited; witness three recent community good turns. One hundred scouts in one day excavated an ice skating rink five rods by eighteen rods, and turned it over to the city for use of the public. Two hundred scouts in one day dug twelve tons of potatoes and distributed them to the worthy poor. Two hundred and fifty scouts cut and delivered ten wagon loads of wood to widows of the city.

THE DONGA TREES

The Donga tree of the Fiji Islands is to be commercially exploited; its bark contains a higher percentage of tannin than the famous Australian and South African wattle bark.—[Scientic American.



CAN'T BE DONE

Bird: How can a fellow turn over a new leaf, when there's not a leaf in sight!

PROOF OF INTEGRITY

A tramp knocked at the farmhouse door and asked for the farmer. To that worthy he recited a tale of woe and asked for a job. "Yes, you can have a job," said the farmer. "You can gather eggs for me if you promise that you won't steal any." "Sir," the tramp said, with eyes brimful of unshed tears, "you can trust me with anything on earth. For twenty years I was manager of the public baths, and I never took a single bath."

HANDLE ALL CASES

In the surgical ward of the scout hospital for disabled toys scouts of Butte, Mont., are busy setting doll's broken limbs, and transfusing new life into old toys. Last year from the toy hospital troops brought forth 1300 healthy playthings to brighten numerous Butte homes where playthings could not be afforded. This year the scouts are even busier, and in their workshop are developing mechanical ingenuity as well as the Christmas good-turn spirit.

STUDY SCOUTING IN SCHOOLS

The value of the Boy Scout movement in citizenship training has caused the Board of Education of Atlanta, Ga., to embody a course on scouting in the school curriculum. The work will be given in the fifth, sixth and seventh grades in the form of a course in civics based on the scout movement. Study of the course will not entitle students to rank as scouts, and is given primarily to acquaint pupils with the aims and scope of the movement.

SCOUTS REVIVE MAN

Three boy scouts of Troop No. 11, which is sponsored by the American Legion Post, Oil City, Pa., recently applied effective measures learned in their scout training to a man who had been overcome by gas. A neighbor who had stopped to call on the family of the stricken man found the victim in an unconscious condition seated on a chair near the gas stove. The wife and baby, who were ill in bed, had not noticed the plight of the father. The caller promptly called for help and the three scouts who responded did much towards the resuscitation of the unfortunate man by forcing the fumes from his lungs by the time physicians arrived.

THE OTHER WAY ABOUT

The grocer, though busy serving customers was not too busy to notice that a small boy standing beside the apple bin was acting rather suspiciously.

"Now then, my lad?" he exclaimed, "what are you up to?"

"Nothin.'"

"Nothing, eh? Well, it looks to me as though you were trying to hook an apple."

"You're wrong, mister," retorted the youngster, "I'm trying not to."

Sallie Snail Goes House-Hunting

CUT ON THIS LINE

Reddy at once flew down and looked all around Miss Sallie, but he couldn't see the house anywhere. "Whatever have you done with it?" he asked. "I don't know," wailed Sallie, "I had it yesterday, but this morning, when I woke up, I found myself out-of-doors, instead of in my little house. I haven't been able to find it since. What shall I do?" Reddy flapped his wings thoughtfully and whistled a few times. "I've heard that homeless little girls are put into orphan asylums," he remarked. Sallie stamped her tail. "I won't go—I won't go to any orphan asylum!" she shrieked, and started to cry harder than ever.

"I guess there's no use waiting," said Reddy, sadly, "we'd better look somewhere else, Sallie. I do wish you could travel faster, I'm afraid we'll never get a house if we go so slow, they'll be all taken before we get there." Just then there was a whirring sound overhead, and Reddy and Sallie looked up and saw an airplane. "That gives me an idea!" exclaimed Reddy. "Why can't I act like an airplane and give you a ride, Sallie?" He bent down as low as he could, and Sallie climbed happily upon his back. Then, with wings spread, Reddy sailed up, up, above the trees, while Sallie held on for dear life.

Reddy and Sallie didn't want to have anything to do with Mr. Sparrow, or Mrs. Sparrow, either, for that matter, so Sallie scrambled on to Reddy's back again, faster than she had ever moved in her life before. This time Reddy flew on and on for a long while, because he was afraid to stop anywhere. He flew and flew until at last he reached the ocean. "We can't go any further than this," he remarked to Sallie. "I don't feel like going to sea, do you, Sallie?" Sallie said she didn't, so they came down. But just before they touched the ground, Sallie began to hop and skip all around Reddy's back. "What is it?" he asked. "Oh, see the pretty houses!" screamed Sallie. Sure enough, the sand was strewn with little sea-shells, just the size and shape of Sallie's lost house. They were empty, too, and Sallie joyfully took possession of one. "Thank you so much, Reddy!" she said, "I can get along beautifully now." So Reddy raised his hat, and left Sallie in her new home.

churned to foam it quieted and not a ripple appeared upon its surface. Both boys stood for some moments in deep thought. Dale was the first to break the spell with, "Anyway, fellow, let's get a few specimens of King Geezer's snakes."

"Cast for them?" Harvey shuddered. "Wade out there and take a chance?"

"Nix—throw lines!"

Accordingly, after a rather nervous afternoon, during which the crazy man remained in seclusion, the boys prepared several lines hung with a number of hooks and baited with bits of rag soaked in bacon grease, also sand toads and grasshoppers. As the first sinker dropped with a chug into the lake some fifty feet from shore, a shrill voice from the rookery across the sand burr patch shouted, "Desecrators! What do you?"

"Want to find out what will happen, is all, [illegible] majesty!" Harvey answered, casting another weight.

Although it was expected that the king would attempt some freakish stunt, he did not appear. Harvey and Dale took turns about staying awake and on guard throughuot the night and when daylight broke across the dunes the lines were examined. Every one was found pulling hard. The stout cords jerked viciously, snapped in the water and with strained curiosity the adventurers cautiously began the inward pull on the lines.

"Careful!" Dale cried with awe as the business end of a line was drawn near shore, every hook seemingly bringing a vicitim. "When we get them in, who, tell me, is going to take the snakes off the hooks?" Wow!"

"They come! They come! You are facing the last moment on earth!" the voice of the strange old man shouted as he again emerged from the hole.

"All right, Geezer; if we face it we are not running!" growled Harvey, greatly excited and tugging at the line until in the shallow water [illegible] squirming, wriggling [illegible] churned like [illegible] to foam.

"They are snakes! They are," shouted Dale, retreating several steps. "I'm cured. I don't want any specimens."

"I'm not cured!" Harvey exclaimed, for the truth dawned upon him; and, throwing the line over a shoulder he tugged like a trojan, dragging to shore six of the biggest and hardest fighting pickerel ever seen in one bunch.

"My snakes" King Geezer cried, hurrying toward the boys, waving his arms and uttering doleful sounds.

"Now, King Geezer," Harvey excitedly exclaimed, "stand back, old Top, and allow me to introduce my friend Dale Hart of the 'snakes'!" then, to his companion, "Come here, you minnow catcher, and gaze upon something real in fish! Pickerel, Kid—and by the holy cat's necktie, what size!"

Both lads danced with glee and the deluded monarch muttered: "Ah, I have spoken truly. The curse of Goose Lake is upon you, Ambassadors of the Big Gazook!"

"Just so you keep off us, we will not mind the curse!" Harvey laughed. "If it is a curse that helped us catch such pickerel as these, just let us be cursed all day!"

The demented man wended his way back to the shack, jingling his rattles as he went and was seen no more. Harvey and Dale broke camp and started homeward before noon. The boys could not guess what form of lunacy might grasp the strange man later, so concluded to take no chances on another night in the vicinity of Goose Lake.

The cloud which hovered over the lake on the previous afternoon and caused the water's strange commotion was composed of grasshoppers, which evidently made a mistake in settling on the surface, and the half-starved fish eagerly fed upon the insects; for, seldom in that forsaken spot did the fish find food in such abundance. That's all there was to the mystery of the strange manifestation when the king stood near the lake and rattled his many snake-tails. Of course he had nothing at all to do with the actions of the pickerel, when thousands of them lashed the water in their greedy efforts to capture the hoppers. Throughout years and years the fish had multiplied without hindrance.

Perhaps never before were pickerel caught with such tackle and bait as our friends used; but it was not strange in this case, for hungry fish as well as hungry animals will eat anything.

The last thing Harvey and Dale heard as they drove away over Freshman's Flats was the sound of the king's rattles. He was not in sight, but the boys knew very well he was watching from some hidden nook.

At a ranch some twenty miles distant the big fish were washed of the salt they had been packed in, ice was obtained and substituted and the catch was safely landed at the home town.

"They look like big snakes, all right!" somebody observed, after listening to the weird tale the lads had to tell.

"According to King Geezer they are, too!" Dale laughed.

OPERATION REVEALS PUZZLE

Galen B. George, 51 years old, 416½ East Fifteenth street, told surgeons at the General Hospital today that he had been a barber thirty-five years and was in the habit of chewing tooth picks.

The surgeons said they believed this was the solution of the puzzle which confronted them Thursday after a ball of wood pulp and hair had been removed from George's stomach in an operation. The ball was 7½ inches in circumference. The surgeons said George had probably swallowed bits of hair while working as a barber and this had combined with wood from toothpicks to form an accumulation of foreign substance in the stomach. Surgeons said George will recover.—[Kansas City Star.

NEWS NOTES FROM OUR "JUNIORLAND"

ACTIVITIES OF YOUNGSTERS TOLD IN BRIEFEST OF PARAGRAPHS

Locker accommodations in the boys' department of the Central Branch Y.M.C.A. have been doubled by the addition of baskets for gymnasium clothing, permitting the boys to place their street clothes in larger lockers than heretofore. There are gymnasium facilities for 500 to 1000 boys in this one branch.

Sons of America camps under the leadership of their various leaders have been spending Saturday afternoons in hikes to Griffith Park, where, after several games, the boys have cooked their own suppers over campfires. Secretary Suter of the Y.M.C.A. reports seven camps now organized.

"Tuning In" was the general theme of the Future Leaders' Conference of high school and college boys of the Ninth-street Branch (colored) Y.M.C.A. Sunday, December 31. Sessions were held in the Wesley M.E. Church. Special speakers were Rev. H. B. Hawes of the Westminster Presbyterian Church and Attorney E. C. Jennings. The purpose of this conference was to develop and train young men and boys for future Christian leadership in the community.

Employed boys will be given an opportunity to meet successful business men in the "Find Yourself" campaign to be conducted the 15th to 18th insts., by the Hollywood, Boyle Heights and Central branches of the Y.M.C.A. C. C. Robinson, popular boys' speaker and boys' work secretary of the international Y.M.C.A. committee, will be present during the campaign. Special addresses and personal interviews will feature the entire program, according to Secretary Caldwell of Central Branch.

Thirty members of the Pioneer Boys' Clubs of the Hollywood Y.M.C.A. spent three days on a hike and camping trip to Switzer's Camp. The boys cooked their own meals and packed their blankets, making a real yet inexpensive camping trip under the leadership of "Y" Secretaries Fred Dye and Stanley Silke. The boys left at 9 o'clock Christmas morning.

Seventy-two Sons of America boys were provided with a Christmas feed and entertainment by the Dormitory Club of young men in the Central Branch Y.M.C.A. the day following Christmas. With blackened faces the young men served the boys themselves, later giving an entertainment that called forth loud cries of approval from the lads. A box of chocolate candy was presented to each boy upon leaving for home.

TELLS OF TEST HIKE

Boy Interestingly Describes Mountain Trip to Qualify for Scout Honors

BY SCOUT PAUL JANSSEN, TROOP NO. 8, B.S.A.

Since I had to take a hike for the first-class test, I thought that I would make it a big three-day one. I planned to go to Big Santa Anita, then over to the West Fork of the San Gabriel; from there west to the source of the Arroyo Seco and then out its canyon to Pasadena. My brother James, who is also a Scout, came with me. We started early Friday afternoon. The first few miles off the trail has been changed a little bit. The auto road has been extended about a mile and a store has been built just a little ways below the halfway house, called 'The Little Gray Inn.'

"So far, we had seen some Anna humming birds, California towees, Stella jays and one other bird which we could not identify. The only trees on this section of the trail are one fine spruce, some small western yellow pines, which were planted along the trail, and a few young, fresh-looking pepper trees planted around the halfway house. The mountains there are covered with scrub oaks and other shrubbery over which grows some love vine. There are Indian pinks and other red flowers in bloom along the trail.

The Sierra Club made a new, little trail into Santa Anita Conyon called Hermit's Trail. We followed the old trail, which reaches the creek at First Water Camp. In the bottom of the canyon were alder, California bay and sycamore trees, and a little bit of underbrush, including fern and nettle. The next two camps were Robert's Camp and Fern Lodge.

Just beyond Fern Lodge, the trail left the stream for a few miles and came back to it near Sturtevant's Camp. It began to grow dark, so we spent the night at a public camp ground just below the camp. In the morning we went to Sturtevant's Camp, where I mailed my card, then we started up the steep trail which led out of the canyon. We were astonished to find the trail covered with all sized deer tracks. They pointed both ways, showing that the deer came down to the stream for a drink at night. There were other tracks on the trail, some squirrel, raccoon and lizard. Where our trail went over the ridge we looked back at Mount Wilson and we could see the observatories and noticed that there was plenty of timber on that side of the mountain. Judging by Mount Wilson, we must have been 5000 feet high. As we went down into the canyon of the West Fork of the San Gabriel we noticed plenty of manzanita.

The West Fork is large and has a wide bed. On the opposite side of the bed from where the river flows we found piles of little branches left by the river, with the bark worn off by the water. There are plenty of yuccas in this canyon. That afternoon we passed through "Kamp Kole," the Y.M.C.A. camp, and Opid's Camp. At Opid's we were lucky to find it ice-cream day. Before nightfall we were quite a way down the Arroyo Seco. This creek does not carry any more water than Santa Anita perhaps, but it has a wide river bed and low weeds are thick on the bottom of this canyon near its source. We saw a group of little black rails here. We spent the night here, although we were bothered by the numerous insects.

In the morning we saw a large owl in the top of a tall tree by the stream, and when I went to the stream for water I found a jay lying on the ground all torn up, which the owl must have killed during the night. As we continued on our journey we passed a large ranger station; then we came to Switzer's Camp. When we were a few miles past the camp we came to a place where the old Switzer's Trail came into the new one. We could see how new the trail was. Since it was Sunday there were plenty of people on the trail to Switzer's Camp.

Oak Wild was the next camp. Being Sunday plenty of automobiles were there, so we expected a ride. But when we got on the auto road we found that all were going to Oak Wild and none were coming back. This canyon is very crowded with cabins. About two miles from Camp Oak Wild there was a landslide across the road, so the cars had to go through the stream to pass.

The next place which we passed was Switzer's Relay. There was a ranger station in this part of the canyon, too. We noticed some kind of wild flowers in this canyon, which we had not seen before on the trip. At the turn where the road leaves the Arroyo Seco near Devil's Gate Dam, an auto came in our direction and the driver offered us a ride, which we gladly accepted, and rode to the Altadena car line. We got him just in time for Sunday dinner.

How to Make a Mail and Package Box

A mail and package box, besides being a great help to the mailman, keeps your doorway neat and keeps safely packages, magazines, and papers which might otherwise be blown away and lost. This box has a foot pedal connected to a compound lever arrangement which raises the lid of the box. This is convenient, because the cover can be lifted and closed while both hands are left free to remove the contents of the box, or one hand is left free while the other carries an umbrella, parcels, or grip.

For the box itself soft wood should be used of about 1-4 inch thickness. The sides, ends, top, and bottom are made according to the drawing plan above, using sixpenny nails for assembling. The cut-outs for the cover hinges must be laid out very carefully and made in such a way that the cover will fit tightly and so keep out dust, wind, and rain.

Next to be made are the lever arms. To get a good fit where the arms are joined together, the screw holes should be planned accurately. This is important, because if there is any weakness here it will soon be increased by continued use. The design of the foot may vary according to your own wishes. It is made with a coping saw and is hinged to the porch.

In the drawing, the height of the box from the floor is for the use of the long lever arm as dimensioned. If you wish to change the height of the box, it can be done by changing the length of the arm accordingly.

It is best to use hard wood for the lever arms, so the screws will not easily pull out. The completed box should, of course, be painted a color to harmonize with the color of the porch or house. Besides adding to the appearance of the work, this is necessary to preserve it from the effects of the weather.

FUEL SAVED

On the last round-trip of the United States liner American, some experiments were conducted and observations made which will in all probability result in a saving of more than $3,000,000 yearly in bunker supplies for the vessels operated by the United States Shipping Board. The work was in charge of Capt. C. A. McAllister, of the American Bureau of Shipping, and the saving is to be accomplished by certain changes in the present arrangements for burning the fuel under the boilers.

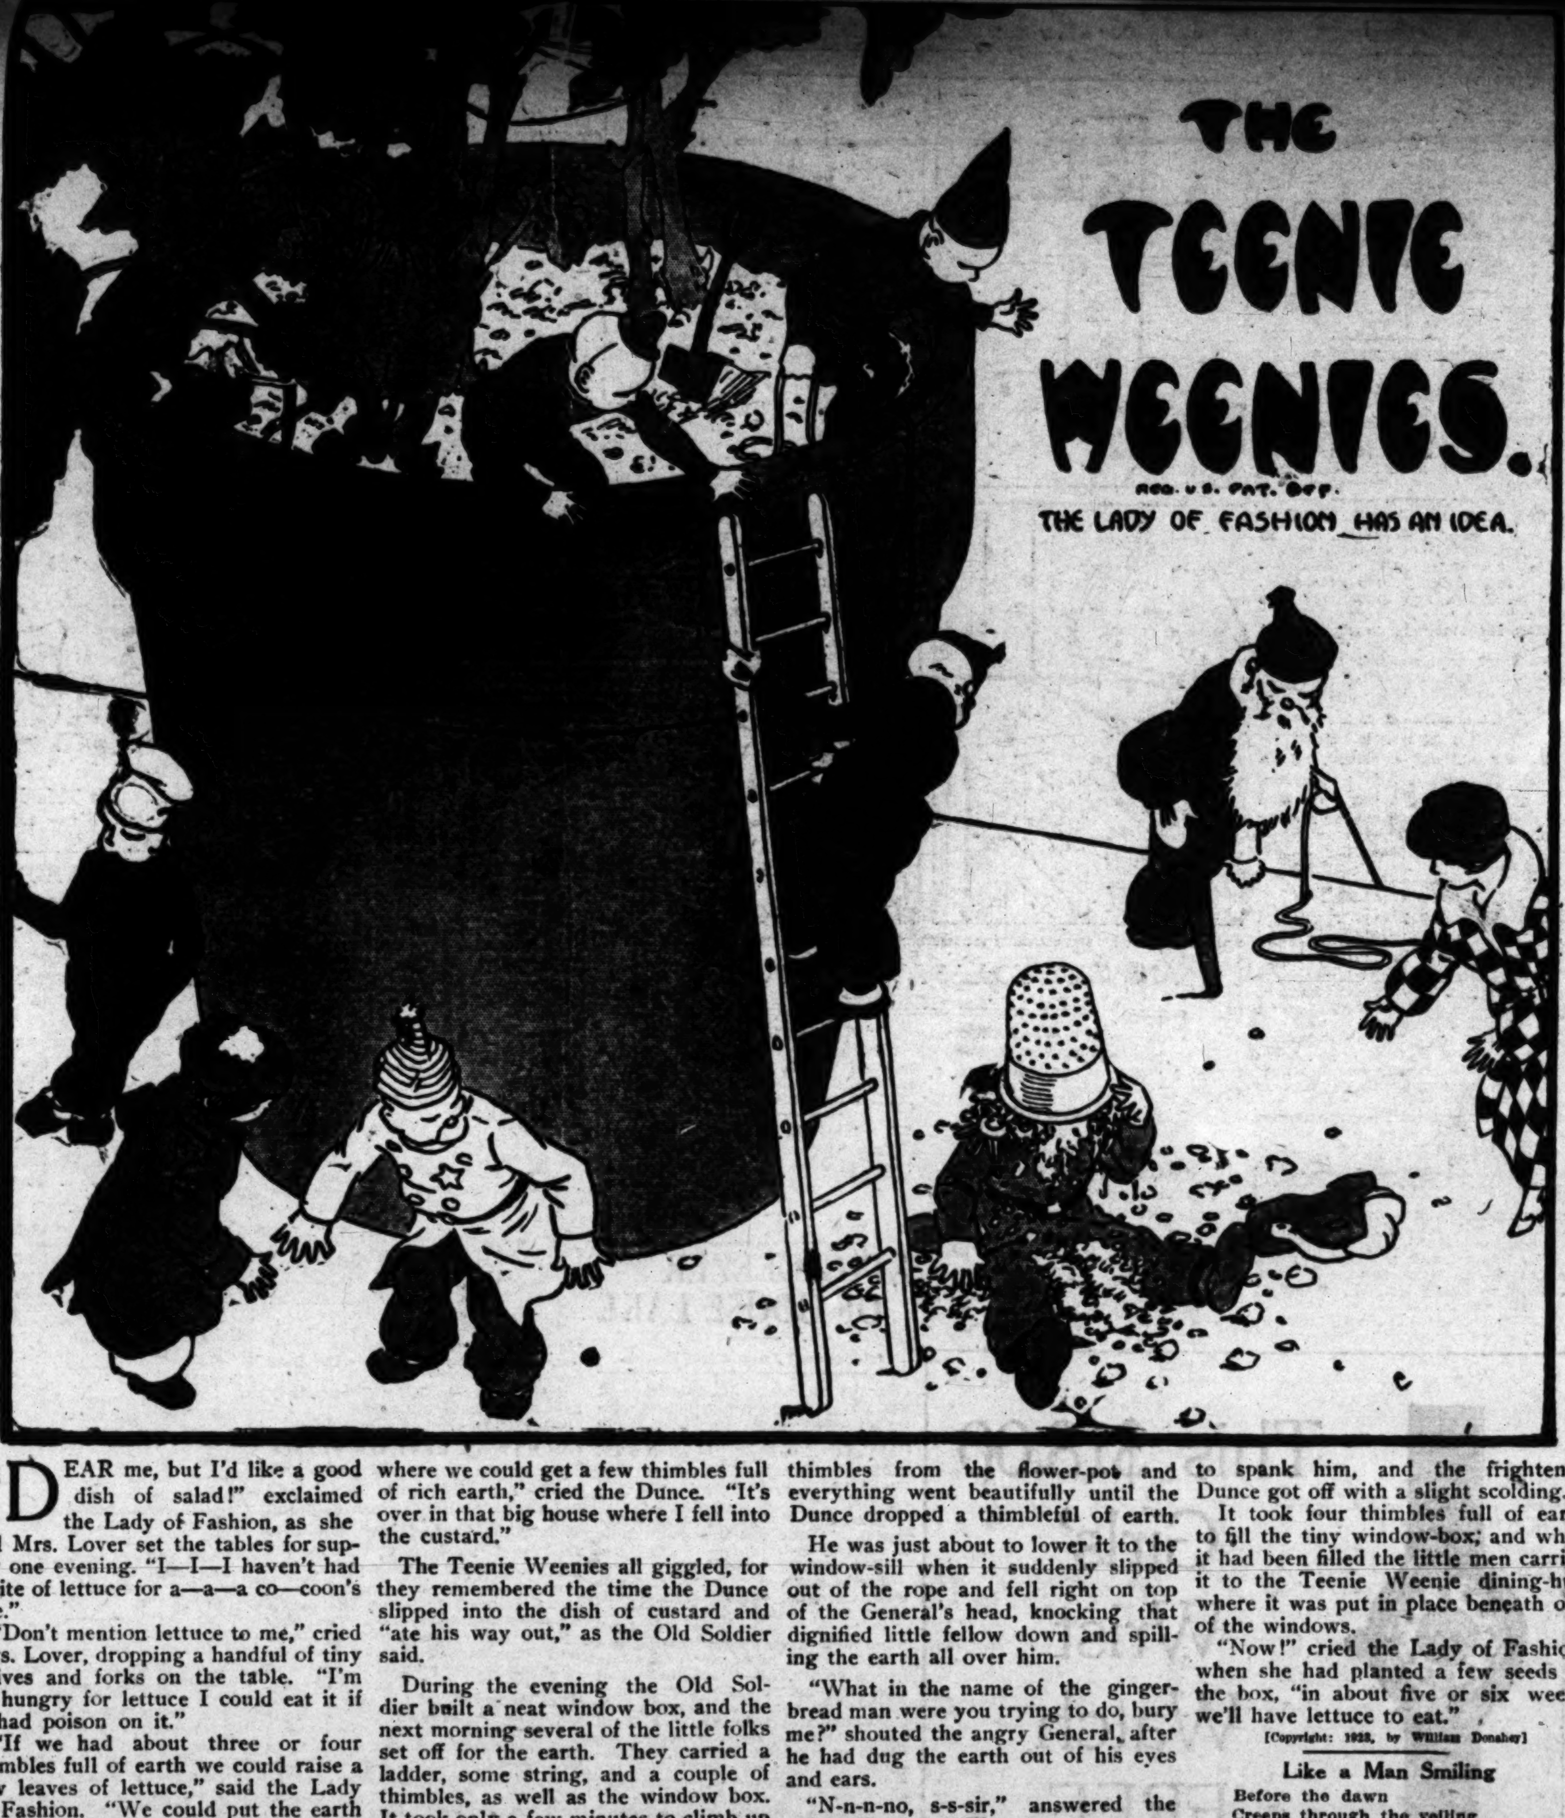
THE TEENIE WEENIES.

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

THE LADY OF FASHION HAS AN IDEA.



"DEAR me, but I'd like a good dish of salad!" exclaimed the Lady of Fashion, as she and Mrs. Lover set the tables for supper one evening. "I—I—I haven't had a bite of lettuce for a—a—a co—coon's age."

"Don't mention lettuce to me," cried Mrs. Lover, dropping a handful of tiny knives and forks on the table. "I'm so hungry for lettuce I could eat it if it had poison on it."

"If we had about three or four thimbles full of earth we could raise a few leaves of lettuce," said the Lady of Fashion. "We could put the earth in a box, and keep it right over there by the window. I have a few seeds, and it is plenty warm enough in here to make them grow."

The Lady of Fashion brought the subject to the attention of the Teenie Weenies that evening when they were all gathered about the supper table, and most of them were quite pleased with the idea.

"Where are you going to get the earth?" asked the Old Soldier. "The ground outside is frozen as hard as a dog biscuit, and we'd never be able to dig it up."

"I know! I know!" shouted the Dunce, so loudly he nearly raised the roof.

"Not so loud, Dunce. We all have ears," cautioned the General.

"I know where there is a flower-pot where we could get a few thimbles full of rich earth," cried the Dunce. "It's over in that big house where I fell into the custard."

The Teenie Weenies all giggled, for they remembered the time the Dunce slipped into the dish of custard and "ate his way out," as the Old Soldier said.

During the evening the Old Soldier built a neat window box, and the next morning several of the little folks set off for the earth. They carried a ladder, some string, and a couple of thimbles, as well as the window box. It took only a few minutes to climb up to the window sill, where the flower-pot stood, and soon they set to work getting the earth. First the thimbles were filled with dirt and then lowered to the window-sill. Then they were carried to the edge and lowered to the floor below, where they were emptied into the tiny window-box. The Clown and the Dunce were filling the thimbles from the flower-pot and everything went beautifully until the Dunce dropped a thimbleful of earth.

He was just about to lower it to the window-sill when it suddenly slipped out of the rope and fell right on top of the General's head, knocking that dignified little fellow down and spilling the earth all over him.

"What in the name of the gingerbread man were you trying to do, bury me?" shouted the angry General, after he had dug the earth out of his eyes and ears.

"N-n-n-no, s-s-sir," answered the scared Dunce. "The r-r-ope s-s-s-s-slipped."

"Well, you come right down here and see if I can't slip you a spanking," shouted the General.

The poor Dunce started tremblingly down the tiny ladder, but before he reached the bottom the Lady of Fashion had pleaded with the General not to spank him, and the frightened Dunce got off with a slight scolding.

It took four thimbles full of earth to fill the tiny window-box; and when it had been filled the little men carried it to the Teenie Weenie dining-hut, where it was put in place beneath one of the windows.

"Now!" cried the Lady of Fashion, when she had planted a few seeds in the box, "in about five or six weeks we'll have lettuce to eat."

HOW TO COLOR THE TEENIE WEENIES

First of all make the flower pot a dark red, then color the leaves and stocks of the geraniums green, and we will have a nice start on this picture.

The General, as usual, is wearing his blue uniform, with gold or yellow epaulets, and the Lady of Fashion has on her checked dress of black and white, with a red hat.

As for the other Teenies, the Dunce and his companions are wearing blue pants and red sweaters, with the exception of Grandpa, who is dressed in red, including his cap.

Like a Man Smiling

Before the dawn
Creeps through the veiling
Of a mist drawn
Over a valley sleeping
  Like a tired man,
  Without sound
Dark trees with limbs high
  Like a pattern
  Softly found
Woven in the blurred sky.

Window of cold
Light from a farmer's dwelling
Seeks to unfold
A radiant greeting,
  Like a happy man cheerfully singing
Flowers open a petaled eye
  Like sorrow flown
  Swiftly winging—
As the birds are flying by.

A cloud above is dancing
To the music from the breeze,
While the sun is playing
The light of a new day on the trees.
  Like a man smiling.

EDWIN EMERY FEARING.

The Wonderful Stories of OZ

By L. Frank Baum

The Girl in the Chicken Coop.

The wind blew hard and joggled the water of the ocean, sending ripples across its surface. Then the wind pushed the edges of the ripples until they became waves, and shoved the waves around until they became billows. The billows rolled dreadfully high; higher even than the tops of houses. Some of them, indeed, rolled as high as the tops of tall trees, and seemed like mountains; and the gulfs between the great billows were like deep valleys.

All this mad dashing and splashing of the waters of the big ocean, which the mischievous wind caused without any good reason whatever, resulted in a terrible storm, and a storm on the ocean is liable to cut many queer pranks and do a lot of damage.

At the time the wind began to blow, a ship was sailing far out upon the waters. When the waves began to tumble and toss and to grow bigger and bigger the ship rolled up and down, and tipped sidewise—first one way and then the other—and was jostled around so roughly that even the sailor-men had to hold fast to the ropes and railings to keep themselves from being swept away by the wind or pitched headlong into the sea.

And the clouds were so thick in the sky that the sunlight couldn't get through them; so that the day grew dark as night, which added to the terrors of the storm.

The captain of the ship was not afraid, because he had seen storms before, and had sailed his ship through them in safety; but he knew that his passengers would be in danger if they tried to stay on deck, so he put them all into the cabin and told them to stay there until after the storm was over, and to keep brave hearts and not be scared, and all would be well with them.

Now, among these passengers was a little Kansas girl named Dorothy Gale, who was going with her Uncle Henry to Australia, to visit some relatives they had never before seen. Uncle Henry, you must know, was not very well, because he had been working so hard on his Kansas farm that his health had given way and left him weak and nervous. So he left Aunt Em at home to watch after the hired men and to take care of the farm while he traveled far away to Australia to visit his cousins and have a good rest.

Dorothy was eager to go with him on this journey, and Uncle Henry thought she would be good company and help cheer him up; so he decided to take her along. The little girl was quite an experienced traveler, for she had once been carried by a cyclone as far away from home as the marvelous Land of Oz, and she had met with a good many adventures in that strange country before she managed to get back to Kansas again. So she wasn't easily frightened, whatever happened, and when the wind began to howl and whistle, and the waves began to tumble and toss, our little girl didn't mind the uproar the least bit.

"Of course we'll have to stay in the cabin," she said to Uncle Henry and the other passengers, "and keep as quiet as possible until the storm is over. For the captain says if we go on deck we may be blown overboard."

No one wanted to risk such an accident as that, you may be sure; so all the passengers stayed huddled up in the dark cabin, listening to the shrieking of the storm and the creaking of the masts and rigging and trying to keep from bumping into one another when the ship tipped sidewise.

Dorothy had almost fallen asleep when she was aroused with a start to find that Uncle Henry was missing. She couldn't imagine where he had gone, and as he was not very strong she began to worry about him, and to fear he might have been careless enough to go on deck. In that case he would be in great danger unless he instantly came down again.

The fact was that Uncle Henry had gone to lie down in his little sleeping-berth, but Dorothy did not know that. She only remembered that Aunt Em had cautioned her to take good care of her uncle, so at once she decided to go on deck and find him, in spite of the fact that the tempest was now worse than ever, and the ship was plunging in a really dreadful manner. Indeed, the little girl found it was as much as she could do to mount the stairs to the deck, and as soon as she got there the wind struck her so fiercely that it almost tore away the skirts of her dress. Yet Dorothy felt a sort of joyous excitement in defying the storm, and while she held fast to the railing she peered around through the gloom and thought she saw the dim form of a man clinging to a mast not far away from her. This might be her uncle, so she called as loudly as she could:

"Uncle Henry! Uncle Henry!"

But the wind screeched and howled so madly that she scarce heard her own voice, and the man certainly failed to hear her, for he did not move.

Dorothy decided she must go to him; so she made a dash forward, during a lull in the storm, to where a big square chicken-coop had been lashed to the deck with ropes. She reached this place in safety, but no sooner had she seized fast hold of the slats of the big box in which the chickens were kept than the wind, as if enraged because the little girl dared to resist its power, suddenly redoubled its fury. With a scream like that of an angry giant it tore away the ropes that held the coop and lifted it high into the air, with Dorothy still clinging to the slats. Around and over it whirled, this way and that, and a few moments later the chicken-coop dropped far away into the sea, where the big waves caught it and slid it uphill to a foaming crest and then down hill into a deep valley, as if it were nothing more than a plaything to keep them amused.

Dorothy had a good ducking, you may be sure, but she didn't loose her presence of mind even for a second. She kept tight hold of the stout slats and as soon as she could get the water out of her eyes she saw that the wind had ripped the cover from the coop, and the poor chickens were fluttering away in every direction, being blown by the wind until they looked like feather dusters without handles. The bottom of the coop was made of thick boards, so Dorothy found she was clinging to a sort of raft, with sides of slats, which readily bore up her weight. After coughing the water out of her throat and getting her breath again, she managed to climb over the slats and stand upon the firm wooden bottom of the coop, which supported her easily enough.

"Why, I've got a ship of my own!" she thought, more amused than frightened at her sudden change of condition; and then, as the coop climbed up to the top of a big wave, she looked eagerly around for the ship from which she had been blown.

It was far, far away, by this time. Perhaps no one on board had yet missed her, or knew of her strange adventure. Down into a valley between the waves the coop swept her, and when she climbed another crest the ship looked like a toy boat, it was such a long way off. Soon it had entirely disappeared in the gloom, and then Dorothy gave a sigh of regret at parting with Uncle Henry and began to wonder what was going to happen to her next.

Just now she was tossing on the bosom of a big ocean, with nothing to keep her afloat but a miserable wooden hen-coop that had a plank bottom and slatted sides, through which the water constantly splashed and wetted her through to the skin! And there was nothing to eat when she became hungry—as she was sure to do before long—and no fresh water to drink and no dry clothes to put on.

"Well, I declare!" she exclaimed, with a laugh. "You're in a pretty fix, Dorothy Gale, I can tell you! and I haven't the least idea how you're going to get out of it!"

As if to add to her troubles the night was now creeping on, and the gray clouds overhead changed to inky blackness. But the wind, as if satisfied at last with its mischievous pranks, stopped blowing this ocean and hurried away to another part of the world to blow something else; so that the waves, not being joggled any more, began to quiet down and behave themselves.

It was lucky for Dorothy, I think, that the storm subsided; otherwise, brave though she was, I fear she might have perished. Many children, in her place, would have wept and given way to despair; but because Dorothy had encountered so many adventures and come safely through them it did not occur to her at this time to be especially afraid. She was wet and uncomfortable, it is true; but, after sighing that one sigh I told you of, she managed to recall some of her customary cheerfulness and decided to patiently await whatever her fate might be.

By and by the black clouds rolled away and showed a blue sky overhead, with a silver moon shining sweetly in the middle of it and little stars winking merrily at Dorothy when she looked their way. The coop did not toss around any more, but rode the waves more gently—almost like a cradle rocking—so that the floor upon which Dorothy stood was no longer swept by water coming through the slats. Seeing this, and being quite exhausted by the excitement of the past few hours, the little girl decided that sleep would be the best thing to restore her strength and the easiest way in which she could pass the time. The floor was damp and she was herself wringing wet, but fortunately this was a warm climate and she did not feel at all cold. So she sat down in a corner of the coop, leaned her back against the slats, nodded at the friendly stars before she closed her eyes, and was asleep in half a minute.

RANUNCULUS and ANEMONES

Two splendid flowers that radiate color and life throughout the early months of spring.

A combination planting of anemones and ranunculus form a carpet which, in color blending, might be likened to the finest Persian rug.

In the anemones are found shades that are truly oriental. Brilliant crimson, vermilion, scarlet, metallic blues, lilacs and purples predominate.

Although the ranunculus are greatly like the anemones in point of growth, foliage, shape of flower, etc., they differ vastly in color. The predominating shades are old gold, burnt orange, yellow, rose, carmine and crimson.

While the colors in these two flowers are vivid they can be so beautifully blended that when planted en masse the effect is a perfect harmony of color.

The plants we offer are splendid stock in 2½-inch pots ready for immediate transplanting to your garden. In this offer the plants will be sold in MIXED COLORS ONLY.

PRICE—$1.00 per doz.
$7.50 per hundred

N. B.—Ranunculus grow a little taller than anemones. The latter should be planted in the foreground.

(In ordering by mail, 10c extra per dozen is required for postage.)

IRISH

ful diagonal coverup, left arm across heart and plexus, right crooked about throat and jaw. Again the clinging of the cat. And he felt the Italian growing stronger. It was like a dead man coming to life again. Life was flowing slowly back to shoulders, from shoulders to arms and hands, to hips and knees.

He stood back to consider this miracle, to think what to do next. Two shaking lefts caught him in the face.

And the gong rang and his chance was gone.

Yes, another six months and he could have won. He would have known how to keep his head, how to finish the Italian crisply. He had him out, out clean. Another punch would have finished it. And he hadn't experience enough—another six months.

Well, what was the use of grousing. It couldn't be helped. He couldn't pass the fight up when it was offered to him. Right at home and so much money.

The money had been needed for the home and the old man. It was funny how much a home cost even on Twenty-fourth street, and the old man was used to a certain way of living. He liked to have a cook, and a girl to do the work around the house. That was the way it was in Ireland. And the old man needed his decent clothes and his spending money for his little drink and his tobacco and papers, and things like that. He couldn't very well put the old man in lodgings. He wasn't accustomed to that. He wanted his home and the cook and girl. He was always accustomed to it, and why shouldn't he have it?

But a house took an awful lot of money. In what the house cost he and the old man could have stayed at a swell hotel. But the old man liked to be by himself. You couldn't blame him; the old man was entitled to a home. No harm in him, you know, but just couldn't get on.

And for all that people thought, a boxer's money wasn't easy. A middleweight didn't get the money lightweights and heavyweights got. If he'd won the championship—ah, that was all right. Let it go! But when you split fifty-fifty with your manager, there was only half of what you fought for; and there was expenses, too. You had to travel a lot, and be nice to people, too. You had to spend a lot in saloons, though you never drank yourself. Keep your end up with the crowd. And there was always old fighters out of luck, and some of them had families, too. You couldn't refuse them even if you'd wanted to. And who's going to help out a fighter except a fighter? And there was always a lot of poor folks.

It seemed a pity, even for the money end, not to have waited. If he'd waited he'd have had the championship, and then he'd have been fixed for life.

If his old man had been a different kind of old man he'd have gone to him and said:

"Hey, old-timer, how about going easy on the jack for a while, hey? Just lay off a bit until I get htings right. Gi' me another half dozen fights under my belt, see, and I'll drop this Guinea cold. And then the champion'll have to give me a fight—the papers'll make him, and you know what he is. He's a bum. So what do you say we get us a couple o' rooms, hey, and go easy for a while. What do you say?"

A different kind of old man would have said: "Sure. We'll take our time, and we'll knock this Guinea for a row of jam jars. And as for the champion, it's a cinch."

But he wasn't that kind of old man. He didn't hold with his fighting nohow. He had no use for it. And he wasn't the kind of old guy you could talk to. Irish thought he must have had a hard time in his life.

Ah, well, he was entitled to a good time now. Let him have his own way. Irish could always make money. It didn't matter so much, after all, did it? The only thing that hurt him was that he would never draw the Stars and Stripes through the green Irish tights. . . .

And he could have, if he'd had only six months.

Irish was aware now as he answered the bell that his bolt was shot. The high pitch of concentration had gone. With the dropping of the Italian, and the Italian's escape, he had reached the high point of his fighting, and now must go down. His punch would be heavy still, but it would lack the terrific speed, the speed of shock, that carries a knockout. And the effect of the cumulation of blows from the Italian sharpshooter was beginning to tell. Through the bruises on his body and neck and the puffiness of his face, energy was flowing out of him like water from some pierced vessel. The stinging lefts to his face had made it hard for him to breathe, and his hands were swollen inside his gloves, and all of a sudden his legs were tired.

Into ten rounds of whirlwind fighting he had foolishly put everything, gambled energy and hands and brain.

And he sensed with a great sinking of his heart that Chip was drawing ahead of him now, drawing away from him in the contest, with the inevitableness of the winner drawing away from the beaten man, forging ahead while the other plods hopelessly on. . . . With the quick telepathy of the ring the Italian knew Irish had cracked, that he was gone. And now the energy he had saved by making his man come to him he could use, he must use. For that knockdown in the tenth was a high score of points against him. And he was afraid of a draw. He would have to fight Irish again. Not again! He must knock him out.

He met the futile rushes with stinging lefts. At close quarters he ripped home his hands mercilessly. As they drew apart he stalked his man. Smack! Smack! It was no hard matter to avoid the rushing of Irish. God! what a glutton Irish was! What he could take, and wouldn't go down.

Mechanically, stolidly, dully, Irish boxed. All about him now was the hoarse murmur of speculation, and the din of it dazed him a little, and the light. And from a cut in his forehead the blood was running into his eyes.

Four times the gong crashed, the end and opening of a round, and the end and opening of another round. Dully he went to his corner. The splash of water in his face did not revive him, nor the current from the whipping towels, nor the slapping of his legs.

"Don't let him knock you out, Irish. Hold him. Only two more rounds. Don't let him knock you out." Maher's fierce whisper hit at his ear drums. So it was as bad as that, hey?

"Hold on to him, kid. Don't fight him. Hold him."

The bell rang. They pushed him to his seat. Wearily he moved toward the center of the ring.

"Look out!" some one called.

The Italian had sprung from his corner with the spring of a cat. And Irish felt surprisedly that he had been struck with two terrific hammers on the jaw. And as he wondered who had hit him his knees buckled surprisingly, and he was on his hands and knees on the floor.

And he heard some one say: ". . . three . . . four . . ." He struggled to his feet. Somewhere Maher was shouting, "Hake the count, Irish." Irish dully wondered what he meant.

And now Chip was in front of him, concentrated, poised. And once more the hammer crashed on the jaw. And he tumbled on the boards on his side.

He was very dull, very dazed. For a while he knew nothing. And then he understood; the referee pumping his hand up and down, and the roar of the crowd.

"Eight!"

As he moved he felt the ropes, and blindly he groped for them, pulling himself to his feet somehow. About him the din surged. The referee stepped back. The Italian was pawing at the referee's arm, protesting. Irish understood. Chip wanted the fight stopped, didn't want to hit him any more. Ah, he was a good kid, Chip was.

And then the ring slithered underneath him; the hand grasping the rope grew lifeless, let go; and the lights went out for him, and Irish crashed forward on his face.

And ice was at the back of his neck, anr the lights were up, and the crowds were milling and Chip was shaking his hand:

"You fine fellow, Irish; you good kid!"

"You're all right, too, Guinea."

"'Sall right, Irish!"

"'Sall right, Chip!"

"He's all right, Chip is," Irish said, as he watched him go across the ring.

Maher put his dressing down around him, helped him to his feet. A great burst of cheering weltered in the garden.

"Do you hear the hand Chip's getting, Danny? I'm glad of it. He's a good lad. I'm glad they're cheering him."

"Him hell!" Maher bawled. "They're cheering you." . . .

The old man looked at the battered face above the blue serge suit.

"Well," he said, "it must have been the grand fight entirely!"

"It was a great fight," Irish grinned, "and a good man won."

"Meaning yourself?"

"No, meaning the Guinea."

"So you were beat, eh?" the old man jeered. "I never thought you were much good at it."

"Ah, I don't know." And Irish grinned again.

"Tell me," the old man snapped. "Did you bring me The Advocate?"

"I did." And Irish handed it over.

"'Tis a wonder you remembered it," the old man snarled. "And the fine lacing you're after taking!"

And Irish grinned again. Wasn't he a queer, grumpy old man!

THE THINKING MACHINE

"I know how you tampered with the clock so as not to interfere with its action or cause any variation at the testing apparatus. You were too superbly clever to stop it or interfere with the circuit. Therefore you simply took out the pin which held on the hands and moved them backward one hour. It was then actually a quarter of 3—you made it a quarter of 2. You showed your daring by invading the dentist's sleeping room. You found his watch on a table beside his bed, set that with the clock, then went out, spoke to Policeman Gillis, whose number you noted, and rang the front door bell. After you left by the front door you allowed time for the household to get quiet again, then re-entered from the rear and reset the watch and clock. Thus your alibi was perfect. You took a desperate chance, and you knew it, but it was necessary."

The Thinking Machine stopped and squinted up into the pallid face. Chase made a hopeless gesture with his hands and sat down burying his face.

"It was clever, Mr. Chase," said the scientist finally. "It is the only murder case I know where the criminal made no mistake. You probably killed De Forrest in a fit of anger, left his rooms while the elevator boy was up stairs, then saw the necessity of protecting yourself, and devised this alibi at the cost of one tooth. Your only real danger was when you made Patrolman Gillis your witness, taking the chance that he did not know or would not remember when you spoke to him."

Again there was silence. Finally Chase looked up with haggard face. "How did you know all this?" he asked.

"Because under the exact circumstances nothing else could have happened," replied the scientist. "The simplest rules of logic prove conclusively that this did happen. By the way," he asked, "what was the motive of the murder?"

"Don't you know?" asked Chase dully.

"No."

"Then you never will," he declared grimly.

When Chase had gone with the detective, Hatch lingered with The Thinking Machine.

"It's perfectly astonishing," he said. "How did you get at it, anyway?"

"I visited the neighborhood, saw how it could have been done, learned through your investigation that no one else appeared in the case; then knowing that this must have happened, tricked Chase into believing I was an eyewitness to the incidents in the alley. That was the only way to make him confess. Of course, there was no one else in it."

One of the singular points in the Chase murder trial was that while the prisoner was convicted of murder on his own statement, no inkling of a motive ever appeared.

Los Conquistadores

I know, I know the songs they sang—
  The swinging songs of fierce content,
The while they trod the weary miles
  Across the hills—to wonderment!

Strong on the lips and ringing true,
  The courage of them led along
Into the Unknown. Cheers for Chance!
  Hope—and their Marching Songs.

Into the dim, gray dawns they sang,
  Out of the long, lean nights;
Faith in their souls and in their hands
  The crimson sword of might.
To them the aftermath of greed
  (The punishment of pride,)
But theirs the gift of fearlessness
  And hidden doors flung wide.

Pain and the beacon of the dream;
  Grimness and sin and hate.
Stormy the blood bought, rock rough ways
  With lure of worlds in wait!

A final silence to their songs.
  Chill and the haunted dark;
But theirs Life's crown of dying well,
  Kept for the brave of heart.

Makers of roads for Victory
  (The Royal Roads of vast intent)
I know, I know the songs they bore
  Across the seas—to wonderment.

Indian Summer

[illegible]
[illegible]
  [illegible]
Gathers all her trailing robes about her,
(Look how the colored ornaments cling—)
With her arms with the tarnished, faded blossoms
Which played their part in her high-colored scene,
And toward oblivion turns her steps.
  But
Her exit unapplauded stabs her pride,
For she has had the homage of the world,
And she would stay; but Winter has his cue . . .
Then Summer to attract again our gaze,
With mellow voice and wooing in her eyes,
Displays her ragged robes of radiant leaves
In blazing show, thus earning a brief glance—
And while the glance is hers trails grandly out,
And Winter comes and Summer is forgot.

Shadows As Well As Sun

THE Millionaires Club of Content and Happiness in the green Verdugo Hills has a rule against any member introducing any subject other than a happy one at the club meetings. And we thought that we could make the same rule to apply to this page every blessed Sabbath morning. We had an idea that we could print things that have to do with happiness only. And the sorrow that is in the world we thought to pass by, because by mentioning it we could do no good.

But sometimes we have to take note of the sorrows that go with life. We cannot always stand in the sun. There are times that we must sit in the shadow, no matter how earnestly we try to avoid it.

Now comes word to us that the Indians of the Volcan Reservation down near Mesa Grande in San Diego county are in trouble again. The government encouraged these Indians and others to raise cattle, which the Volcan Indians have done. But they have been recently ordered off a patch of pasture land which white men in that section have come to be possessed of. Wherefore, the cattle must die, and the Indians must suffer the loss, because there is not sufficient land for the cattle to graze on.

And almost every day word comes to us from some other section of the country of similar wrongs inflicted on the native tribes. The tireless and always brutal exploitation of the Indian at the hands of our government continues. The little oligarchy known as the Indian Bureau never ceases its policy of wrong and stupidity.

George Washington, the Father of our Country, and its first President, said that the war for independence could never have been won except for the friendship of the Indian tribes. Abraham Lincoln said that it is the duty of the government to protect the Indians. And Warren G. Harding, now President of the United States, says that steps should be taken for the Indians' protection. But nothing has ever been done, and there is nothing in sight now of anything being done to lift a finger to right the wrongs of the past or to help the Indians on their dark and troubled pathway of existence.

It is the most dreadful and fearful situation in history, as far as we have knowledge of its pages.

And it is a most awful thing to contemplate, because it is true that God always punishes every nation that commits a wrong. What punishment the Father of all races and of all nations, the Creator of heaven and earth will visit on America for its horrible treatment of the native peoples, we must wait in awe to know.

Admitted

WE TAKE pleasure in announcing to an Old Timer who lives up San Jacinto way, that he has been admitted to full membership in the Congregation of the Faithful. His seat is waiting for him in the synagogue and all he has to do is to step in and take it.

You all know very well that it is a condition of membership in the Congregation that a man shall say his prayers. He can be red, white, black or yellow; he can belong to any church he pleases, or no church at all. He can vote the Republican, Democratic, Prohibition or Socialist ticket on election day—whichever ticket suits him. But he can't really be a member of the Congregation of the Faithful unless he says his prayers. He can sit in the synagogue, of course, because it is open to all. But that doesn't make him a member of the Congregation.

What we want to tell you about, however, is that the Old Timer has sent us a message. And in the message he says this:

"Now I don't get down on my knees to tell God what He ought to do and what He ought not to do, but if 'Prayer is the soul's sincere desire,

Unuttered or expressed,'

then I pray every day of my life, and many times a day."

That's enough, Old Timer. The point is that you pray. How you do it, or when or where, is for you to decide.

Come into the synagogue and take your seat as a member of the Congregation.

They Answer Yes

THE news that we have to announce in the synagogue ot the Congregation of the Faithful this blessed Sunday morning is both sad and glad news.

It is sad news for us who still sit in the synagogue and must look to a vacant chair where an old friend who was well beloved will sit no more. But we must be glad for him who is gone. Because his burdens are laid down. His heart has slipped its cares. And his feet are set in the fields of asphodel beside the still waters of the Kingdom that has no end.

Which is to say that Frank Batturs has gone away. His soul is sped from this life into the other. The temple of his soul, which was his body, has been laid away among the thronging hills of the Golden Gate where his eyes first beheld the light of day on earth.

The Scribes in the Synagogue will miss him most. Although even the Pharisees will miss him, too. For, maybe the Pharisees are not as bad as they are painted to us. They are only a little puffed up, maybe, and misguided. But they, or no one else, could help loving Frank Batturs if only for the reason that he loved every fellow human creature of his on the face of the earth.

But, he was dearest of all to the Scribes. And, by the Scribes we mean newspaper men. We take little liberties with words, like that, don't you know, not being deeply learned, and very much askew on our theology.

Well, anyway, while all the world loved this man, it was we poor devils of the quill who held him most warmly and devotedly in our hearts. Because he was so tirelessly kind to us. There was never a time that he did not have us in his thoughts.

And, in the old days when the Scribes would hie away from their tripods and printing presses for a night and a day of care-free wanderings in the coaches of the railway trains whose destinies Frank Batturs guided, he would ask one question over and over again. One question always would he ask the Scribes when their day of play had come. And the question he asked was simply, "Is everybody happy?"

That's all he ever wanted to know—was everybody happy? If so, all was well. If not, he would find a way to make them happy. It seemed that his great object in life, his only aim in living, was to make folks happy.

Now—well, now, he will never ask again, on this earth, the old, fond question, "Is everybody happy?" Because he has gone from here to Another Place. We shall never see his face in the Synagogue again; nor hear his voice.

But, when he went away, and when the Jasper Gates were opened for him to pass through, we think we can see his big, bright, sunny smile as he surveyed the innumerable caravans that passed before him in the green ways of Paradise. And we can see him as he leaped blithely among the wanderers on the high roads of heaven and shouted to them in the old, cheery voice, "Is everybody happy?"

And the answer to him there will be yes.

Here it was not always that we answered yes. Here we have our troubles and our cares, our griefs and disappointments. But, yonder where the River of Life is flowing and the Tree of Life is blooming, they have no troubles anymore, no cares, no griefs or disappointments. And they answer yes, when they are asked if they are happy.

And heaven is happier now than it ever was before. Because, just lately, on a still night when the stars were deep, the Jasper Gates swung wide to let Frank Batturs in.

A Song Unsung

Speech failed and left me dumb and mute,
And then love smiled and bade me sing.
And though my heart-strings were a lute
My blundering fingers broke the string.

I dipped my pen in blood and tears,
And wrote that I might pain assuage—
Deep in the archives of the years
Is hid a blurred and blotted page.

For lo! my hands were gnarled and sere,
From fires of fate mine eyes were blurred;
And though my listening heart could hear,
I could not sing the song I heard.

But oh! my song will yet be cold,
And so with peace my heart is strong.
I know in God's love book of gold
Is writ my story and my song.

My silent song is held in trust
Lest of these dreams I grow too fond;
The song that failed this tongue of dust
Will sound some morning on beyond.

And there sometime in language fine
Immortal lips shall speak for me,
And Israfel, this song of mine
Shall sing in rapturous melody.

CYRUS C. JOHNSON.

A Difference of Opinion

THERE was what you might call a hot argument a few evenings ago in the little gray house in the hollow in the green Verdugo Hills.

Most of the neighbors were present. And it was at about the time of the third (censored) that the argument came up.

And the way the whole thing started was that the man who reads the papers had been telling the neighbors that he had seen a piece in a paper which said that lots of things people used to think were true have lately been found out not to be true at all.

He said that the piece in the paper called attention to some of these things. That it is not true, for instance, that Cleopatra was a beautiful woman; the fact being that she was fat, had a pug nose, bad teeth and many other physical defects. That if she were living now, and in Hollywood, she couldn't get a job in the movies unless it might be as a freak.

Also, the piece in the paper said—and this was the most important thing of all—that the Aryan race, of which we have all boasted so much, is a myth. It never existed. There really never was an Aryan race.

By gollies, said the man who reads the papers, what's the use of going to school and studying books if it is going to turn out that we are simply storing up on misinformation. Think of the college professors and the high-brows generally who went swaggering around because they were booked up on Egypt and the Aryan race and everything like that. And how they assumed a superiority over other folks because they knew more. And now we find out that every danged thing they swaggered about knowing was stuff that was all bosh.

So, basing his conclusion on modern revelation, the man who reads the papers contended that it isn't worth while to stock up on learning. Because, he said, likely as not the next generation will dump all that we know into the ash barrel.

Well, sir, the man who reads the papers had the neighbors pretty well swung over to his way of thinking. And the chances are that he would have gotten away with it, as the saying is, had not the man who has the phonograph taken issue with him.

In these matters, said the man who has the phonograph, as to whether or no Cleopatra was beautiful, and as to whether or no there was an Aryan race, and whether there ever was such a man as Abraham, the father of the Jews—as some say now there never was—it makes no difference whatever. And if a man thinks he knows something, and he doesn't, it makes no difference unless it is about when a train leaves, or when to plant rutabagas, or maybe that he thinks he has a balance in the bank when, as a matter of fact, his account is overdrawn.

There are countless millions of people who lived and died in the firm belief that the earth was flat, that the sun moved, and that you couldn't make an iron ship floae on the water. And it didn't hurt them a bit. If they lived good lives they went to heaven just the same.

And it isn't going to worry me out of a minute's sleep, said the man who has the phonograph, if the things I think I know now will be discovered to be bunk a thousand years from now

Well, sir, it would take a book to tell all that was said, pro and con, on this subject of knowledge, true and false, that night in the little gray house in the hollow in the green Verdugo Hills.

But, in the end, everybody parted good friends. The man who has the phonograph put a tune on the machine that had a merry lilt to it. It is the tune that they call "Drowsy Maggie." It is a tune of the pipes, and no one that ever hears it can fail to be put in a good humor by it.

All is Vanity

ONE night, not long ago, when the wild horses of the rain were galloping across the mountains, some of the neighbors were sitting with us in our little high house in the hills.

And there was a grand wood fire blazing on the hearth. And our Yellow Cat was stretched out before it, the very personification of luxury.

The man who reads the papers was there, and he was saying to the neighbors that he had just been reading, that very day, a wonderful piece in a paper about a party of British archaeologists who had unearthed in Egypt the grave of an ancient king. And that they found untold treasures in the king's grave. Jewels, golden coins, crowns, armor, precious stones and everything like that.

And from what the man who reads the papers told the neighbors it was figured out that the king had been dead about 4000 years. And that all the treasure had lain undisturbed with him during those forty centuries.

And, now, by gollies, said the man who has the phonograph, a bunch of Britishers come along with picks and shovels, and they dig up this treasure and load it in wagons and ships, and take it home with them, and spend it for beer and skittles.

And, when all this was said, our Yellow Cat, with memories of Egypt smoldering in his amber eyes, rose solemnly and humped his back, and then lay down and went to sleep again in the warmth and comfort of the wood fire.

THE NEW BELGIUM

bricks and other building materials, hauled by big Belgian horses, pass by us, and the sound of the hammer and saw is broken only by the tooting of the horn of that rubber-neck motor-bus, filled with American tourists, which is just coming in.

Now Jules starts the machine with a crank and we ride along through the streets turning this way and that, seeing new structures everywhere going up. Our hearts burn as we pass the ruined Cathedral and Halles with their acres of still falling walls. Parts of them are already surrounded by scaffolding and the masons have started to make reparations but it seems impossible that they can succeed; for the ruins look like those of Timgad or Pompeii, and in places no better than the remains of old Carthage, which was wiped again and again from the face of the earth.

The farm wagons used in Belgium are quite different from ours. They have three wheels, two big ones and a little one under the tongue in front. These men in the wheat field were glad to pose for their photographs.

Re-creating the Villages Goes Merrily On

NOW we have left the city and are riding about over the country, through villages which at the time of the Armistice were in ruins. We pass collections of portable one-story houses painted yellow and see new buildings going up everywhere. The landscape is spotted with patches of red, each patch the tiled roof of a new farm house or new village. Every old house has a new roof and on some of the roofs I see the figures 1920 or 1921 or 1922 painted or worked in with other tiles of black and blue. Red in China is the sign of good luck. Here in Belgium it is the sign of reconstruction and it means that prosperity is coming back to the people.

Most of the houses are of brick or stone. Nearly all have but one story with ridged roofs ending close to the walls. It is only in the larger towns that you see two and three-story buildings. Already more than 40,000 private buildings have gone up and the new public buildings number 700 or more.

Much of the work is being done with money raised by what might be called the National Co-operative Confederation, consisting of 300 different co-operative societies which have combined. By the first of July, 1921, this association had made building loans of more than 500,000,000 francs and it then issued a loan with lottery prizes, the highest of which was $100,000. The loan was issued in shares of 250 francs par at a price of 200 francs, making each share at the current rate of exchange cost $20 or less. The shares bear 4 per cent interest and pay no income tax. Suppose our government should recognize a loan without tax, in which we could buy 4 per cent bonds worth $25 for $20 apiece, each bond to be numbered, and each carrying a chance in a series of lottery drawings by which, if we hold a lucky number, we might be paid back our money and win all the way from $100 to $100,000—would not those bonds sell? They are selling in Belgium and those already issued are far above par. Other similar loans are proposed. They will probably be greedily grabbed.

But Jules has stopped his automobile at Leugenboom, a little village near Moere, and motions to us to get out. We do Moere, and motions to us to get out. We do so and follow him to a turnstile where, by paying a franc, we enter a woods and follow a trail to the "Long Max of Moere," a little brother of the "Big Bertha" that sent shells seventy-five miles into Paris. This German gun was used to fire upon Dunkirk on the English Channel, twenty-eight miles away. It is fourteen inches in diameter and its barrel is so large that when I offered a boy of 12 a franc to crawl in that I might photograph him looking out, he had no trouble in doing so. The barrel is forty-two inches in circumference, and its long shell was, I venture, much taller than the boy. The gun is mounted on a great concrete foundation with a sunken pit, walled with iron, beneath it. It can be raised and lowered and swung around as though on a pivot. Close by was a dummy gun which was used with a smoke and flash apparatus to draw the British fire.

In a dug-out, which was probably used for storing ammunition, I found a Belgian peddling lace. He had beautiful table cloths at a low price and lace collars of fine work which cost only $2 or $3. He brought out the pillow on which he himself had made much of his wares, telling us that the finest of his stock had required weeks of work.

Rapid Work in Reconstructing the Forests

LEAVING Moere, we pass great stacks of barbed wire taken out of the fields and lying in sight of the new construction. We see huge tank after tank upturned, broken, and rusting away by the roadside. There are three in that field over there. We go by wind mills, tall white towers of brick or wood, throwing their red arms about. They make me think of Don Quixote and his fight with the wind mill. He succeeded almost as well as the Germans. The wind mills here are used to grind corn, and are operated from the farmsteads near by.

so and follow him to a turnstile where, by

See that stack of stumps and logs near those houses of bright yellow bricks. They come from trees along the roadside cut off by the shells. We ride on between rows of young trees newly planted. Farther on we go by a dead thicket that looks like parts of Gatun Lake in Panama when the dam had drowned out the tropical woods. That thicket was once a beautiful forest which was destroyed by the shells. During their occupation of Belgium, the Germans cut down timber worth several hundred millions of dollars. They often cut old and young, and in some places even the orchards were ruined. In Hainaut, Liege and Namur large wooded areas were entirely destroyed.

Bruges Now the Venice of the North

RIDING on to the northeast, we go through the ancient city of Bruges. It once vied with Ypres, having 150,000 inhabitants, although now it is not more than one-third of that size. It is a city of canals. It is nearly surrounded by them and the waterways run through the town. A new ship canal six miles long connecting it with Zeebrugge was opened in 1907, and you will remember that the latter port on the North Sea was a German submarine base during the war. It was badly damaged by the bombardment of the Allied airmen, and the Germans sank large cranes in the docks, as well as twelve ships and other small craft in the basins. In order to clear the harbor the canal has been blocked and the water pumped out. Bruges itself was not damaged to any extent, and steamers now come into the harbor.

Another great canal city is Ghent, through which we pass on our ride back to Brussels. It is cut up by waterways which divide it into thirteen islands connected by fifty-eight bridges. This is a quaint old Flemish town whose medieval buildings, great cathedral and belfry, and many museums are the delight of the tourist. About the time of Columbus it was the most important city in Flanders and it again has on its seven-league boots and is rapidly growing. With its suburbs, its population is now more than 200,000 and it is more than sixteen miles in circumference. A wide ship canal deep enough for all ocean-going merchant vessels connects the town with the Scheldt. In 1913 more than 1200 ships, with a tonnage of over 1,000,000 tons, came into Ghent, and although the German troops when they retreated destroyed a great part of the canal and obstructed its navigation by sinking five torpedo boats and all the canal boats and dredges, it is again practically open and in 1920 it was entered by more than 500 vessels of almost 400,000 tons.

Ghent stands next to Antwerp as the chief port of Belgium. It is noted for its imports of cotton which come from the United States by the tens of thousands of tons, and it has great cotton and linen mills which have more than 1,500,000 spindles and about 50,000 looms.

CAYENNE

draw their ration money, as they do that of uncaptured fugitives. It has often been proved quite possible for a guard at least passively to bring about a prisoner's death, merely for the few cents a day he can pocket for his rations. Naturally there is much underground favoritism, and the prisoner with money or powerful friends outside can usually get away. The guard is not only amenable to a bribe, but glad to have another dead man on his ration books. Such escapes are generally engineered from over the Dutch border.

Clever American Criminal Makes His Escape

AN EXPERT American cracksman, well known to our police, "did a job" in Paris a few years ago and was sent to Cayenne; few who have been there will blame the perfectly respectable Americans of Parimaribo for helping him to escape. The German who attempted to get Morocco to revolt against French rule escaped while I was in the Guianas, and there were very persistent rumors to the effect that the German Moravian missionaries in Dutch Guiana knew quite well how it happened.

The prisoners themselves sometimes help their oppressors in the matter of ration money, for they have secret societies of bloodthirsty tendencies and private enmities are often settled while the prison camp lies in restless slumber. Sometimes it is merely a quick stab upward in the darkness through a stretched-canvas bed; sometimes a ring is formed by the other prisoners, and the two opponents, each armed with a knife and attended by a second who has no other right than to give his man another knife if his own is knocked from his hand, go at it, with no quarter asked or given. The guards will not risk their lives—and their probable "rake-off"—by entering and attempting to stop the fight in the dark, and when one is killed he is left to lie where he has fallen until morning, when every one in the room assures the investigating official that he slept soundly all night long. Death naturally has few terrors for these convicts, and it is impossible to punish them more than they are already being punished; hence there is no motive to restrain themselves. In short, Cayenne definitely proves the existence of a hell, though its geographical location does not exactly tally with the notions of old-fashioned theologians.

SAN DIEGO'S MISSION

evenly spaced, blocked figures proved, occurred in 1738!

Several weeks, perhaps months, must have elapsed before this bell was cool enough to be released from its mold. Fancy the face of the founder, if he were a sincere manufacturer, when he discovered, not only that the entire inscription was awry; but that the "3" was upside down and the "8" slipped drunkenly away from its companions!

Possibly he meditated: "When the results of ignorance, carelessness or indifference are as firmly solidified in character as these figures are on this bell, the only remedy for either is a recast." But, because he so obviously did not recast "Santa Maria Madalena," it is more than likely that he simply swore roundly at whoever stuck the wax letters and figures (made by pressing patterns into a plaster mold, afterward pouring in wax) which, hardened at first, had not stuck to the clay bell when the outside mold was swept up. Perhaps, too, the workman was not lettered and did not know which side up to affix the "3."

None may know the surge of joy that swept, again and again, over me as I realized that I had found a mission bell, more than likely one Father Serra brought from Lower California, in 1769, except one as eager as I. None was there to see me pat the soft Spanish inscription sweeping in smiling serenity around "Madalena's" ample girth except the astonished little Mexican lad; and he inconsequently and hurriedly backed down the narrow stairs while I laughed aloud at his disquietude.

This Bell Has a Long Romantic History

HOW I longed to know details! Where was this bell cast? Who by? How did it come to California—by packet-boat or by pack-train? How was its unwieldly bulk hoisted from foundry to cart or wharf; from cart or wharf to some church; from ground to towers, one, two, three stories high? Knowing the lack of mechanical skill among the Indians, one doubts if it was raised to its first high home as was the big bell in the Cathedral of Mexico City—step by step as the towers were built; and then again, one remembers that no such daily elevation was practical, for no mission church was built in one year, or two, or even three.

Ah! how silent the long-past years; the sea-depths; the sky-breadths; the valleys' calm, the mountain solitudes. Gradually my sense of restless impatience calmed and I recalled Mrs. Browning's:

"God's greatness
Flows around our incompleteness,
'Round our restlessness,
His rest,"

and I knew then that all I should find out about the mission bells would be revealed in good time.

Presently I realized that it was not to be easy to take "Madalena's" picture. She could not be induced to move. I had all I could do to crowd in beside her. The bells she "taught to speak" meekly took up only what space they absolutely required.

But the straddle-legged tripod simply had to squeeze in. How about "focus?" A thought—a bright idea. Flying to the place where augurs are to be found; flying back again in the heat of a midafternoon in August (never did stars seem so steep nor so long!) I bored a hole in the flooring. After tying a lengthy string to the shutter of the camera I pushed the other end of the cord through the augur-hole. Before going to the compartment below I begged the senora to do me a favor; and, when the film was developed, I saw that she, rising, like a dowager duchess, superior to mere imperfections in apparel, had registered the calm assurance to which her years and high position entitled her.

As I once more stood beside her and looked over the city that has grown up since she first sent her voice over the placid waters of the bay, I felt as Cabrillo must have felt when he sailed into this same harbor and knew he had discovered what before his advent had been but a belief—California. Exultantly he cried: "It is mine! I have found it!"

And, emulating Cabrillo, who gave his discovery to one whom he served, I as proudly give "Santa Maria Madalena" my discovery, to its rightful owner—California history!

The INTRUDERS

by Albert Payson Terhune

ILLUSTRATED BY CHARLES LIVINGSTON BULL

IT BEGAN with a gap in a line fence. The gap should never have been there. For on the far side of it roamed creatures whose chief zest in life is the finding of such gaps and in breaking through for forage.

The Place's acreage ended, to northward, in the center of an oak grove whose northern half was owned by one Titus Romaine, a crabbed little farmer of the old school. Into his half of the grove, in autumn when mast lay thick and rich amid the tawny dead leaves. Romaine was wont to turn his herd to swine.

To Lad, the giant collie, this was always a trying season. For longer than he could remember, Lad had been the official watchdog of the Place. And his chief duties were to keep two-footed and four-footed strays from trespassing thereon.

To an inch he knew the boundaries of the Master's land. And he knew that no human intruder was to be molested, so long as such intruder had the sense to walk straight down the driveway to the house. But woe to the tramp or other trespasser who chanced to come, crosslots, or to wander in any way off the drive! Woe also to such occasional cattle or other live stock as drifted in from the road or by way of a casual fence-gap!

Human invaders were to be met in drastic fashion. Quadruped trespassers were to be rounded up and swept at a gallop up the drive and out into the highroad. With cattle or with stray horses this was an easy job; and it contained, withal, much fun—at least, for Lad.

But pigs were different.

Experience and instinct had taught Lad that what few humans realize. Namely, that of all created beasts, the pig is the worst and meanest and most vicious; and hardest to drive. When a horse or a cow, or a drove of them, wandered into the confines of the Place, it was simple and joyous to head them off, turn them, set them into a gallop and send them on their journey at top speed. It took little skill and less trouble to do this. Besides, it was gorgeous sport. But pigs—!

When a porker wriggled and hunched and nosed a space in the line fence, and slithered greasily through, Lad's work was cut out for him. It looked simple enough. But it was not simple. Nor was it safe.

In the first instance, pigs were hard to start running. Oftener than not they would stand, braced, and glare at the oncoming collie from out their evil little red-rimmed eyes, the snouts above the hideous masked tushes quivering avidly. That meant Lad must circle them at whirlwind speed, barking a thunderous fanfare to confuse them, and watching his chance to flash in and nip ear or flank; or otherwise get the brutes to running.

And, even on the run, they had an ugly way of wheeling, at close quarters, to face the pursuer. The razor tushes and the pronged forefeet were always ready, at such times, to wreak death on the dog, unless he should have the wit and the skill and the speed to change, in a breath, the direction of his dash. No, pigs were not pleasant trespassers. There was no fun in routing them. And there was real danger.

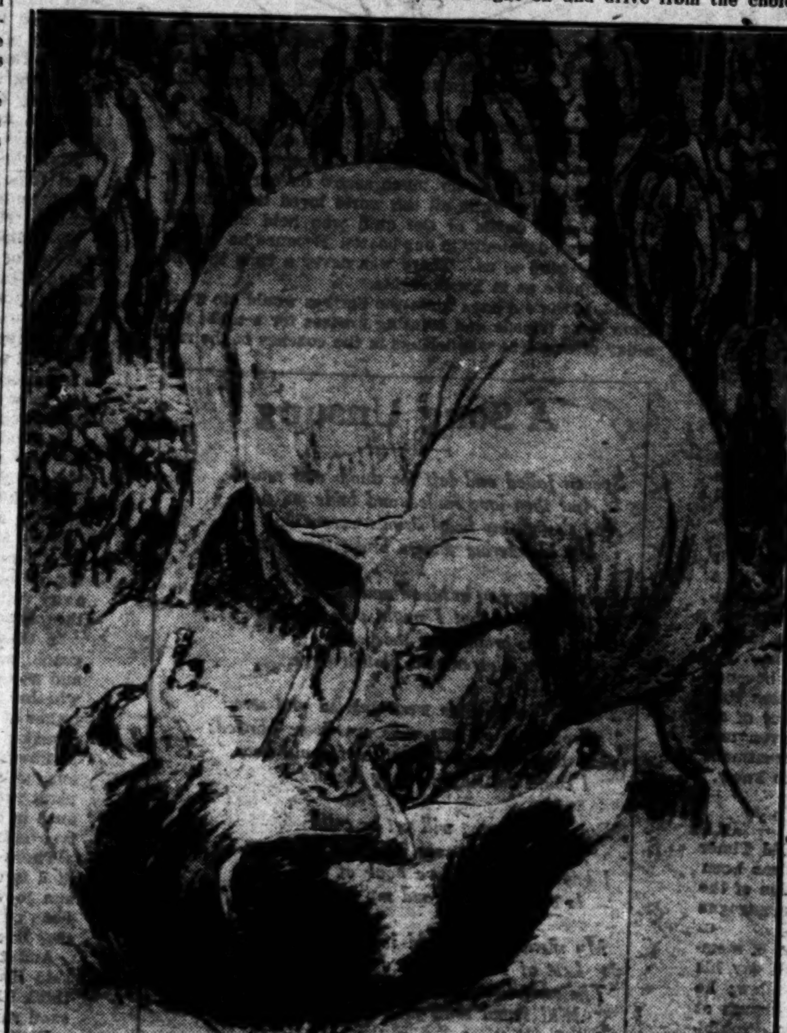
Except by dint of swiftness and of brain, an eighty-pound collie has no chance against a 600-pound pig. The pig's hide, for one thing, is too thick to pierce with an average slash or nip. The pig is too close to earth and too well-balanced by build and weight to be overturned. And the tushes and forefeet can move with deceptive quickness. Also, back of the red-rimmed little eyes flickers the redder spirit of murder.

Locomotive engineers say a cow on a track is far less perilous to an oncoming train than is a pig. The former can be lifted by the impact and flung to one side. A pig, oftener than not, derails the engine. Standing with the bulk of its weight close to the ground, it is well-nigh as bad an obstacle to trains as would be a boulder of the same size. Lad had never met any engineers. But he had indentically their opinion of pigs.

In all his long life the great collie had never known fear. At least, he never had yielded to it. Wherefore, in the autumns, he had attacked with gay zest such of Titus Romaine's swine as had found their way through the fence.

But, nowadays, there was little enough of gay zest about anything Laddie did. For he was old—very, very old. He had passed the fifteenth milestone. In other words, he was as old for a dog as is an octogenarian for a man.

Almost imperceptibly, but to his indignant annoyance, age had crept up on the big dog; gradually blurring his long clean lines; silvering his muzzle and eyebrows; flecking his burnished mahogany coat with stipples of silver; spreading to greater size the absurdly white little forepaws which were his one gross vanity; dulling a little the preternaturally keen hearing and narrowing the vision.



The sow's flaming little brain now held no thought except to mangle the dog.

Yes, Lad was old. And he was a bit unwieldy from weight and from age. No longer could he lead Wolf and Bruce in the forest rabbit chases. Wherefore, he stayed at home, for the most part; and seldom strayed far from the Mistress and the Master whom he worshiped.

Moreover, he deputed the bulk of trespass-repelling to his fiery little son, Wolf; and to the graver and sweeter Bruce—"Brucé, the Beautiful."

Which brings us by needfully prosy degrees to a morning when tyo marauders came to the Place at the same time, if by different routes. They could not well have come at a more propitious time, for themselves; nor at a worse time for those whose domain they visited.

Bruce and Wolf had trotted idly off to the forest, back of the Place, for a desultory ramble in quest of rabbits or squirrels. This they had done because they were bored. For the Mistress and the Maste had driven over for the morning mail, and Lad had gone with them, as usual. Had it been night instead of morning, neither Wolf nor Bruce would have stirred a step from the grounds. For both were trained watchdogs. But, thus early in the day, neither duty nor companionship held them at home. And the autumn woods promised a half hour of mild sport.

The superintendent and his helpers were in the distant "upper field," working around the roots of some young fruit trees. But for the maids, busy indoors, the Place was deserted of human or canine life.

Thus, luck was with the two intruders.

Through the fence-gap in the oak grove bored Titus Romaine's hugest and oldest and crankiest sow. She was in search of acorns and of any other food that might lie handy to her line of march. In her owner's part of the grove there was too much competition, in the food-hunt, from other and equally greedy pigs of the herd. There she could fight on and drive from the choicest acorn-boards. But it was easier to forage without competition.

So through the gap she forced her grunting bulk, and on through the Place's half of the oak grove. Pausing now and then to root amid the strewn leaves, she made her leisurely way toward the open lawn with its two-hundred-year-old shade-oaks, and its flower-borders which still held a few toothsome bulbs.

The second intruder entered the grounds in much more open fashion. He was a man in the late twenties; well-set-up, neatly, even sprucely dressed; and he walked with a slight swagger. He looked very much at home and very certain of his welcome.

A casual student of human nature would have guessed him to be a traveling salesman, finely equipped with nerve and with confidence in his own goods. The average servant would have been vastly impressed with his air of self-assurance, and would have admitted him to the house without question. (The long-memoried warden of Auburn prison would have recognised him as Alf Dugan, one of the cleverest automobile thieves in the East.)

Mr. Dugan was an industrious young man, as well as ingenious. And he had a streak of quick-witted audacity which made him an ornament to his chosen profession. His method of work was simple. Coming to a rural neighborhood, he would stop at some local hotel and, armed with clever patter and a sheaf of automobile insurance documents, would make the rounds of the region's better-class homes.

At these he sold no automobile insurance, though he made seemingly earnest efforts to do so. But he learned the precise location of each garage, the cars therein, and the easiest way to the high road, and any possible obstacles to a hasty flight thereto. Usually he succeeded in persuading his reluctant host to take him to the garage to look at the cars and to estimate the insurance value of each. While there it was easy to palm a key or to get a good look at the garage padlock for future skeleton-key reference, or to note what sort of car locks were used.

A night or two later, the garage was entered and the best car was stolen. Dugan, like love, laughed at locksmiths.

Sometimes—notably in places where dogs were kept—he would make his initial visit and then, choosing a time when he had seen some of the house's occupants go for a walk with their dogs, would enter by broad daylight, and take a chance at getting the car out unobserved. If he were interrupted before starting off in the machine—why, he was that same polite insurance agent who had come back to revise his estimate on the premium needed for the car, and was taking another look at it to make certain. Once in the driver's seat and with the engine going, he had no fear of capture. A whizzing rush to the highroad and down it to the point where his confederate waited with the new number plates, and he could snap his fat fingers at pursuit.

Dugan had called at the Place, a week earlier. He had taken interested note of the little garage's two cars and of its unlocked doors. He had taken less approving note of the three guardian collies: Lad, still magnificent and formidable, in spite of his weight of years: Bruce, gloriously beautiful and stately and aloof; young Wolf, with the fire and fierce agility of a tiger-cat. All three had watched him, grimly. None had offered the slightest move to make friends with the smooth-spoken visitor. Dogs have a queerly occult sixth sense, sometimes, in regard to those who mean ill to their masters.

This morning, idling along the highroad, a furlong from the Place's stone gateway, Dugan had seen the Mistress and the Master drive past in the smaller of the two cars. He had seen Lad with them. A little later, he had seen the men cross the road toward the upper field. Then, almost on the men's heels, he had seen Bruce and Wolf canter across the same road, headed for the forest. And Dugan's correctly stolid face rippled into a pleased smile.

Quickening his pace, he hurried on to the gateway and down the drive. But, as he passed the house on his way to the garage where stood the other and larger car, he paused. Out of an ever-vigilant eye-corner he saw an automobile turn in at the gateway, 200 yards up the wooded slope, and start down the drive.

The Mistress and the Master were returning from the postoffice.

Dugan's smile vanished. He stopped in his tracks, and did some fast thinking. Then, mounting the veranda steps, he knocked boldly at a side door—the door nearest to him. As the maids were in the kitchen or making up the bedrooms, his knock went unheard. Half hidden by the veranda vines, he waited.

The car came down the driveway and circled the house, to the side farthest from Dugan. There, at the front door, it halted. The Mistress and Lad got out. The Master did not go down to the garage. Instead, he circled the house again, and chugged off up the drive, bound for the station to meet a guest whose train was due in another ten minutes.

Dugan drew a long breath, and swaggered toward the garage. His walk and manner had in them an easy openness that no honest man could possibly have acquired in a lifetime.

striking 2" written by the dying man. "Did you recognize the voices?"

"No, sir, I couldn't. They were not clear."

That was the substance of Moran's story. Detective Mallory then called at the telegraph office, and indisputable records there showed that a message had been telephoned for Thomas at precisely six minutes of 2. Detective Mallory was satisfied.

Within an hour Franklin Chase was under arrest. Detective Mallory found him sound asleep in his room in a boarding-house less than a block away from the Avon. He seemed somewhat astonished when informed of his arrest for murder, but was quite calm.

"It's a mistake," he protested.

"I don't make mistakes," said the detective. He had a short memory.

FURTHER police investigation piled up the evidence against the prisoner. For instance, minute blood stains were found on his hands, and a drop or so on the clothing he had worn the night before, and it was established by three fellow-lodgers—young men who had come in late and stopped at his room—that he was not in his boarding-house at 2 o'clock the night before.

That afternoon Chase was arraigned for a preliminary hearing. Detective Mallory stated the case, and his statement was corroborated by necessary witnesses. First he established the authenticity of the dying man's writing. Then he proved that Chase had been with De Forrest at half past 11 o'clock; that there had been a quarrel, or argument, in De Forrest's room just before 2 o'clock, and finally, with a dramatic flourish, he swore to the blood stains on the prisoner's hands and clothing.

The august court stared at the prisoner and took up his pen to sign the necessary commitment.

"May I say something before we go any further?" asked Chase.

The court mumbled some warning about anything the prisoner might say being used against him.

"I understand," said the accused, and he nodded; "but I will show that there has been a mistake—a serious mistake. I admit that the writing was Mr. De Forrest's; that I was with him at half-past 11 o'clock, and that the stains on my hands and clothing were blood stains."

The court stared.

"I had known Mr. De Forrest for several years," the prisoner went on quietly. "I met him at the theater last night and walked home with him. We reached the Avon about half-past 11 o'clock, and I went to his room; but I remained for only ten or fifteen minutes. Then I went home. It was about five minutes of 12 when I reached my room. I went to bed, and remained in bed until 1 o'clock, when, for a reason which will appear, I rose, dressed, and went out, say about ten minutes past 1. I returned to my room a few minutes past 3."

Detective Mallory smiled sardonically.

"When I was arrested this morning I sent notes to three persons," the prisoner went on steadily. "Two of these happen to be city officials, one the city engineer. Will he please come forward?"

There was a little stir in the room, and the court scratched one ear gravely. City Engineer Malcolm appeared inquiringly.

"This is Mr. Malcolm?" asked the prisoner. "Yes? Here is a map of the city issued by your office. I would like to ask, please, the approximate distance between this point," and he indicated on the map the location of the Avon, "and this." He touched another point far removed.

The city engineer studied the map carefully. "At least two and a half miles," he explained.

"You would make that statement on oath?"

"Yes; I have surveyed it myself."

"Thank you," said the prisoner courteously, and he turned to face the crowd in the rear. "Is Policeman No. 1122 in court? I don't know his name."

Again there was a stir, and Policeman Gillis came forward.

"Do you remember me?" inquired the prisoner.

"Sure," was the reply.

"Where did you see me last night?"

"At this corner," and Gillis put his finger down on the map at the second point the prisoner had indicated to the city engineer.

The court leaned forward eagerly to peer at the map. Detective Mallory tugged violently at his mustache.

Into the prisoner's manner there came tense anxiety. "Do you know what time you saw me there?" he asked.

Policeman Gillis was thoughtful for a moment.

"No," he replied at last. "I heard a clock strike after I saw you, but I didn't notice."

The prisoner's face went deathly white for an instant, then he recovered himself with an effort.

"You didn't count the strokes?" he asked.

"No, I wasn't paying any attention to them."

The color rushed back into Chase's face, and he was silent for a moment. Then: "It was 2 o'clock you heard strike?" It was hardly a question, rather a statement.

"I don't know," said Gillis. "It might have been. Probably it was."

"What did I say to you?"

"You asked me where you could find a dentist, and I directed you to Dr. Sitgreave across the street."

"You saw me enter Dr. Sitgreave's house?"

"Yes."

The accused glanced up at the court, and that eminent jurist proceeded to look solemn.

"Dr. Sitgreave, please," called the prisoner.

The dentist appeared, exchanging nods with the prisoner.

"You remember me, doctor?"

"Yes."

"May I ask you to tell the court where you live? Show us on this map, please."

Dr. Sitgreave put his finger down at the spot which had been pointed out by the prisoner and by Policeman Gillis, two and a half miles from the Avon.

"I live three doors from this corner," explained the dentist.

"You pulled a tooth for me last night?" went on the prisoner.

"Yes."

"Here!" and the prisoner opened his mouth.

The dentist examined him closely. "Yes."

"You may remember, doctor," went on the prisoner quietly, "that you had occasion to notice the clock, first after I called at your house. Do you remember what time it was?"

"A few minutes before 2—seven or eight minutes, I think."

Detective Mallory and the court exchanged bewildered glances.

"You looked at your watch, too. Was that exactly with the clock?"

"Yes, within a minute."

"And what time did I leave your office?" the prisoner asked.

"Seventeen minutes past 2—I happen to remember," was the reply.

The prisoner glanced dreamily around the room twice, then his eyes met Detective Mallory's. He stared straight into that official for an instant, then turned back to the dentist.

"When you drew the tooth, there was blood, of course. Is it possible that I got stains on my fingers and clothing?"

"Yes, certainly."

The prisoner turned to the court, and surprised a puzzled expression on that official countenance.

"Is anything else necessary?" he inquired courteously. "It has been established that the moment of the crime was 2 o'clock. I have shown by three witnesses—two of them city officials—that I was two and a half miles away at that moment. I could not have walked two and a half miles under half an hour; I couldn't have come on a car under ten minutes—hardly that."

There was a long silence as the court considered the matter. Finally he delivered himself briefly. "It resolves itself into a question of the accuracy of the clocks," he said. "The accuracy of the clock at the Avon is attested by the known accuracy of the clock in the telegraph office, while it seems established that Dr. Sitgreave's clock was also accurate, because it was with his watch. Of course, there is no question of veracity of witnesses, it is merely a question of the clock in Dr. Sitgreave's office. If that is shown to be absolutely correct, we must accept the alibi."

The prisoner turned to the elevator man from the Avon. "What sort of clock was that you mentioned?"

"An electric clock, regulated from Washington Observatory," was the reply.

"An electric clock, regulated from Washington Observatory."

"And yours, Dr. Sitgreave?"

"An electric clock, regulated from Washington Observatory."

The prisoner remained in his cell until 7 o'clock that evening, while experts tested the three clocks. They were accurate to the second; and it was explained that there could have been no variation of either without this variation being recorded by the delicate testing apparatus. Therefore, it came to pass that Franklin Chase was released on his own recognizance, while Detective Mallory wandered off into the sacred precincts of his private office to hold his head in his hands and think.

Hutchinson Hatch, reporter, had followed the intricacies of the mystery from the discovery of De Forrest's body, through the preliminary hearing, up to and including the expert examination of the clocks which immediately preceded the release of Franklin Chase. When this point was reached his mental condition was not unlike that of Detective Mallory—he was groping hopelessly, blindly, in the mazes of the problem.

It was then that he called to see Prof. S. F. X. Van Dusen—The Thinking Machine. That distinguished man listened to a recital of the known facts with petulant, drooping mouth and the everlasting squint in his blue eyes. As the reporter talked on, corrugations appeared in the logician's expansive brow, and these gave way in turn to a network of wrinkles. At the end The Thinking Machine sat twiddling his long fingers and staring upward.

"This is one of the most remarkable cases that has come to my attention," he said at last, "because it possesses the unusual quality of being perfect in each way; that is, the evidence against Chase is perfect, and the alibi he offers is perfect. But we know instantly that if Chase killed De Forrest, there was something the matter with the clocks, despite expert opinion. We know that as certainly as we know that two and two make four, not sometimes but all the time, because our reason tells us that Chase was not in two places at 2 o'clock. Therefore, we must assume either one or two things—that something was the matter with the clocks—and if there was we must assume that Chase was responsible for it—or that Chase had nothing whatever to do with De Forrest's death, at least personally."

The last word aroused Hatch to a new and sudden interest. It suggested a line of thought which had not yet occurred to him.

"Now," continued the scientist, "if we can find one flaw in Chase's story, we shall have achieved the privilege of temporarily setting aside his defense and starting over. If on the contrary he told the full and exact truth and our investigation proves that he did, it instantly clears him. Now, just what have you done, please?"

"I talked to Dr. Sitgreave," replied Hatch. "He did not know Chase—never saw him until he pulled the tooth, and then didn't know his name. But he told me really more than appeared in court; for instance, that his watch had been regulated only a few days ago, that it had been accurate since, and that he knew it was accurate next day, because it enabled him to keep an important engagement. That being accurate, the clock must be accurate, because they were together almost to the second.

"I also talked to every other person whose name appears in the case. I questioned them as to all sorts of possibilities, and the result was that I was compelled to accept the alibi—not that I am unwilling to, of course, but it seems peculiar that De Forrest should have written the name as he was dying."

"You talked to the young men who went into Chase's room at 2 o'clock?" inquired The Thinking Machine casually.

"Yes."

"Did you ask either of them the exact condition of Chase's bed when they went in?"

"Yes," replied the reporter. "I see what you mean. They agreed that it was tumbled as if some one had been in it."

The Thinking Machine raised his eyebrows slightly. "Suppose, Mr. Hatch, that you had a violent toothache," he asked after a moment, still casually, "and were looking for relief, would you stop to notice the number of a policeman who told you where there was a dentist's office?"

Hatch considered it calmly, as he stared into the inscrutable face of the scientist. "Oh, I see," he said at last. "No, I hardly think I should, and yet I might."

Later Hatch and The Thinking Machine, by permission of Detective Mallory, made an exhaustive search of De Forrest's apartments in the Avon, seeking some clew. When The Thinking Machine went down the single flight of stairs to the office he seemed deeply perplexed.

"Where is your clock?" he inquired of the elevator man.

"In the inside office, opposite the telephone booth," was the reply.

The scientist went in and, taking a stool, clambered up and squinted fiercely into the very face of the timepiece. He said "Ah!" [illegible] phone book, "just a word with Dr. Sitgreave."

He asked the dentist only two questions, and their nature caused Hatch to smile. The first was:

"You have a pocket in the shirt of your pajamas?"

"Yes," came the wondering reply.

"And when you are called at night you pick up your watch and put it in that pocket?"

"Yes."

Then The Thinking Machine turned to Hatch. "We are safe in believing," he said, "that De Forrest was not killed by a thief, because his valuables were undisturbed; therefore we must believe that the person who killed him was an acquaintance. It would be unfair to act hastily; so I shall ask you to devote three or four days to getting his history in details; find out all about him.

"If you uncover anything in particular I shall give you the name of the person who killed him, and an arrest will follow. The solutions is quite clear, unless some now unknown fact gives another turn."

At the end of four days Hatch returned to The Thinking Machine and summed up results briefly in one word: "Nothing."

The Thinking Machine went out and was gone for two hours. When he returned he went straight to the telephone and called Detective Mallory. The detective appeared after a few minutes.

"Have one of your men go at once and arrest Chase," The Thinking Machine instructed. "Bring him here, and I'll show you the flaw in the perfect alibi he set up."

An hour later Franklin Chase entered with Detective Mallory. He was somewhat pale and nervous, and in his eyes lay a shadow of apprehension. Over it all was the gloss of ostentatious nonchalance and self-control. There were introductions. Chase stared visibly at a casual reference to an "important new witness."

"An eyewitness," added The Thinking Machine.

Positive fright came into Chase's manner, and he quailed under the steady scrutiny of the narrow blue eyes. The Thinking Machine dropped back into his chair and pressed his long white fingers tip to tip.

"Please just follow me for a moment, Mr. Chase," he said at last. "You know Dr. Sitgreave, of course? Yes. Well, it just happens that I have a room a block or so away from his house around the corner. These are Mr. Hatch's apartments." He stated it so convincingly that there was no possibility of doubt. "Now my room faces straight up an alley which runs directly back of Dr. Sitgreave's house. There is an electric light at the corner."

Chase started to say something, gulped, then was silent.

"I was in my room the night of Mr. De Forrest's murder," went on the scientist, "and was up moving about, because I, too, had a toothache. It just happened that I glanced out my front window." His tone had been courteous in the extreme; now it hardened perceptibly. "I saw you, Mr. Chase, come along the street, stop at the alley, glance around, and then go into the alley, I saw your face clearly under the electric light, and that was at twenty minutes to 3 o'clock. Detective Mallory has just learned of this fact, and I have signified my willingness to go on the witness stand and swear to it."

The accused man was deathly white now; his face was working strangely, but still he was silent. It was only by a supreme effort that he restrained himself.

"I saw you open a gate and go into the back yard of Dr. Sitgreave's house," resumed The Thinking Machine. "Five minutes or so later you came out and walked on to the cross street, where you disappeared. Naturally I wondered what it meant. It was still in my mind about half-past 3 o'clock, possibly later, when I saw you enter the alley again, disappear in the same yard, then come out and go away."

"I—I was not—not there," said Chase weakly. "You were—were mistaken."

"When we know," continued The Thinking Machine steadily, "that you entered that house before you entered by the front door, we know that you tampered with Dr. Sitgreave's watch and clock, and when we know that you tampered with those we know that you murdered Mr. De Forrest as his dying note stated. Do you see it?"

Chase rose suddenly and paced feverishly back and forth across the room. Detective Mallory discreetly moved his chair in front of the door. Chase saw and understood.

PROBLEM OF THE PERFECT ALIBI

SKULKING along through the dense gloom, impalpably a part of the murky mist which pressed down between the tall board fences on each side, moved the figure of a man. Occasionally he shot a glance behind him, but the general direction of his gaze was to his left, where a fence cut off the small back yards of an imposing row of brownstone residences. At last he stopped and tried a gate. It opened noiselessly, and he disappeared inside. A pause. A man came out of the gate, closed it carefully, and walked on through the alley toward an arc light, which spread a generous glare at the intersection of a street.

Patrolman Gillis was standing idly on a corner, within the light radius of a street lamp, debating some purely personal questions, when he heard the steady clack, clack, clack of footsteps a block or more away. He glanced up and dimly saw a man approaching. As he came nearer the policeman noticed that the man's right hand was pressed to his face.

"Good evening, officer," said the stranger nervously. "Can you tell me where I can find a dentist"

"Toothache!" inquired the policeman.

"Yes, and it's nearly killing me. If I don't get it pulled, I'll—I'll go crazy."

The policeman grinned sympathetically. "Had it myself, I know what it is," he said. "You passed one dentist down in the other block, but there's another just across the street there," and he indicated a row of brownstone residences; "Dr. Paul Sitgreave. He'll charge you good and plenty."

"Thank you," said the other.

He crossed the street, and the policeman gazed after him until he mounted the steps and pulled the bell. After a few minutes the door opened, the stranger entered the house, and Patrolman Gillis walked on.

"Dr. Sitgreave here?" the stranger inquired of a servant who answered the bell.

"Yes."

"Please ask him if he can draw a tooth for me. I'm in a perfect agony, and—"

"The doctor rarely gets up to attend to such cases," interrupted the servant.

"Here," said the stranger, and he pressed a bill into the servant's hand. "Wake him for me, won't you? Tell him it's urgent."

The servant looked at the bill, then opened the door and led the patient into the reception-room.

Five minutes later, Dr. Sitgreave, gaping, entered and nodded to his caller.

"I hated to trouble you, doctor," explained the stranger; "but I haven't slept a wink all night."

He glanced around the room until his eye fell upon a clock. Dr. Sitgreave glanced in that direction. The hands of the clock pointed to 1:53.

"Phew!" said Dr. Sitgreave. "Nearly 2 o'clock! I must have slept hard. I didn't think I'd been asleep more than an hour." He paused to gape again and stretch himself. "Which tooth is it?" he asked.

"A molar; here," said the stranger, and he opened his mouth.

Dr. Sitgreave gazed officially into his innermost depths and fingered the instruments of torture.

"That tooth's too good to lose," he said after an examination. "There's only a small cavity in it."

"I don't know what's the matter with it," replied the other impatiently, "except that it hurts. My nerves are fairly jumping."

Dr. Sitgreave was professionally serious as he noted the drawn face, the nervous twitching of hands, and the unusual pallor of his client. "They are," he said finally; "there's no doubt of that. But it isn't the tooth; it's neuralgia."

"Well, pull it anyway!" pleaded the stranger. "It always comes in that tooth, and I've got to get rid of it some time."

"It wouldn't be wise," remonstrated the dentist. "A filling will save it. Here," and he turned and stirred an effervescent powder in a glass. "Take this and see if it doesn't straighten you out."

The stranger took the glass and gulped down the foaming liquid.

"Now sit right there for five minutes or so," instructed the dentist. "If it doesn't quiet you, and you insist on having the tooth pulled, of course—"

He sat down, and glanced again at the clock, after which he looked at his watch and replaced it in a pocket of his pajamas. His visitor was sitting, too, controlling himself only with an obvious effort.

"This is real neuralgia weather," observed the dentist at last, idly; "misty and damp."

"I suppose so," was the reply. "This began to hurt about 12 o'clock, just as I went to bed, and finally it got so bad that I couldn't stand it. Then I got up and dressed and came out for a walk. I kept on, thinking that it would get better; but it didn't, and a policeman sent me here."

There was a pause of several minutes.

"Feel any better?" inquired the dentist.

"No, I think you'd better take it out."

"Just as you say."

The offending tooth was drawn, the stranger paid him, with a sigh of relief, and after a minute or so started out. At the door he turned back.

"What time is it, now, please?" he asked.

"Seventeen minutes past two," replied the dentist.

"Thanks," said the stranger. "I'll just have time to catch a car back home."

"Good night," said the dentist.

"Good night."

Skulking along through the dense gloom, impalpably a part of the murky mist which pressed down between tall board fences on each side, moved the figure of a man. Occasionally he shot a glance behind him, but the general direction of his gaze was to his left, where a fence cut off the small back yards of an imposing row of brownstone residences. At last he stopped and tried a gate. It opened noiselessly, and he disappeared inside. A pause. A man came out of the gate, closed it carefully, and walked on through the alley toward an arc light, which spread a generous glare at the intersection of a street.

Next morning at 8 o'clock, Paul Randolph De Forrest, a young man of some social prominence, was found murdered in the sitting-room of his suite in the big Avon apartment-house. He had been dead for several hours. He sat at his desk, and death left him, sprawled upon it face downward. The weapon was one of several curious daggers which had been used ornamentally on the walls of his apartments. The blade missed the heart only a quarter of an inch or so; death must have come at once.

Detective Mallory went to the apartments accompanied by the medical examiner. Together they lifted the dead man. Beneath his body, on the desk, lay a sheet of paper on which were scrawled a few words; a pencil was clutched tightly in his right hand. The detective glanced, then stared at the paper; it startled him. In the scrawly, trembling, incoherent handwriting of the dying man were these disjoited sentences and words:

"Murdered . . .
Franklin Chase . . . quarrel . . .
stabbed me . . .
am dying . . .
God help me . . .
clock striking 2 . . .
good-by."

The detective's jaw snapped as he read. Here was crime, motive and time. After a sharp scrutiny of the apartments, he went down the single flight of stairs to the office floor to make some inquiries. An elevator man, Moran, was the first person questioned. He had been on duty the night before? Yes.

"What time was he here?"

"About half-past 11, I should say. He and Mr. De Forrest came in together from the theater."

"When did Mr. Chase go away?"

"I don't know, sir. I didn't see him."

"It might have been somewhere near 2 o'clock?"

"I don't know, sir," replied Moran again. "I'll—I'll tell you all I know about it. I was on duty all night. Just before 2 o'clock a telegram was 'phoned for a Mr. Thomas on the third floor. I took it and wrote on it the time that I received it. It was then just six minutes before 2 o'clock. I walked up from this floor to the third—two flights—to give the message to Mr. Thomas. As I passed Mr. De Forrest's door, I heard loud voices, two people evidently quarrelling. I paid no attention then, but went on. I was at Mr. Thomas's door possibly five or six minutes. When I came down I heard nothing further, and thought no more of it."

"You fix the time of passing Mr. De Forrest's door first at say, five minutes of 2?" asked the detective."

"Within a minute of that time, yes, sir."

"And again about two or a minute or so after?"

"Yes."

"Ah," exclaimed the detective. "That fits in exactly with the other and establishes beyond question the moment of the murder." He was thinking of the words "clock trolling muscles, but extends ultimately to the finer, smaller ones, as in the face and scalp, the toes and fingers. It tends, if accompanied, by fresh air, to tone up the entire muscular system. In the case of women, it can be readily seen that its tendency is to beautify, for that elusive quality is so dependent on health.

The fact that the body is of "automobile" character, intended to furnish its own motion without outside power, is indisputable. All that is healthy in bone, nerve, blood supply and oxygenation is secured through muscle play, which is the means of all motion in the organism.

Pain Killers

PAIN is a warning signal, given to us by nature.

If we did not feel pain, we should die, without knowing the reason.

Following the example of "medical science," commercialism prepares and vends "pain killers."

This is like clamping down the safety valve of a boiler, when the boiler threatens to explode.

I have previously quoted following illustration, by the late Dr. Dio Lewis, but it is so pertinent, that it is worth repeating:

"A ship's crew is seized with some fearful malady. They hang out a flag of distress. Another ship passes near the infected vessel. Its captain discovers the flag of distress. A boat's crew is sent to cut it down. The captain turns to his passengers with the triumphant exclamation, 'We have saved them. All signs of distress have disappeared!'

"A human body is diseased in every part. A flag of distress is hung out in the form of an ulcer at the ankle. Some ignorant physician sees it. He covers it with a salve which compels it to close. Then he cries, 'See, it is all gone!'"

Salt

OF ALL my teachings the one which the average reader finds the most difficult to believe in, or carry out, is abstention from the mineral, chloride of sodium (table salt.) Yet, on the other hand, there are few health rules that have produced such notably favorable results of this when it has been tried.

The idea that chloride of sodium, in the inorganic form, is a necessity for health is a superstition. Chlorine and sodium are only two of the dozen minerals found in the human body, also in natural foods that have not been spoiled by overcooking, or emasculated as in the bolting of flour. If we should take chloride of sodium, why should we then not also take the inorganic form, potassium and calcium and magnesium and iron and phosphorus, and sulphur and silicon, all of which are found in the body? Following is an extract from a letter from Seattle to the Pittsburg Dispatch:

"When the government school-teachers first went into the Arctic, they were told to teach the natives how to cure their meat. Liberal supplies of salt were taken in and the good work was begun. But the strange Eskimos refused to eat the salted meat and promptly spewed it out of their mouths. Then the government pedagogues made a discovery. They found that all that was printed in the little old text-books that they had passed examinations on was not just exactly so. These books had told them of the wonderful yearning for salt that they said was a common attribute of mankind. But there in the gray Arctic world was a race of men who positively hated salt and had never used it in any way. For they had found a way of curing their meat that was far superior to the white man's salting process. They simply froze it."

Peace

IN THE Pope's recent encyclical he says:

"In the peace of Christ, respect for order and authority will return, but only the Catholic church, the united and infallible holder and interpreter of this doctrine of Christ, has the capacity efficaciously to fight that materialism which has already accumulated so many ruins, and to bring back to individuals, families and society the true holy Christian spirituality, as superior to the philosophical as revelation is superior to pure reason; the capacity to teach true democracy, instilling into the masses the spirit of true fraternity.

"Therefore, by restoring Christian reign, we have done efficaciously the work for the present and future pacification of humanity—the work prepared for us with the almost divine instinct which Benedict XV admirably developed."

Peace does not come from adherence to the formulas of any one religious organization, but from a spirit of justice and mercy, in the hearts of men.

It may be remembered that at a time when the Catholic church was most absolutely entrenched in power, Europe was devastated by savage and cruel wars.

Friends

FOLLOWING was sent out by Arthur W. Kinney of Los Angeles in the shape of a Christmas card:

"God give me friends in every walk of life;
And be they high or lowly, rich or poor,
I rate their friendship more than wealth or fame,
More than the social strivings of the hour.

The value true of friends we seldom know—
In life, we're prone to sense their frailties;
In death their virtues shine effulgently.
If in our love for them we find delight,
We should make haste to let them know that we
In grateful memory may forever dwell.

Who lives enshrined in hearts of worthy friends
Shall live years rich in service to mankind,
And face drear age and death full smilingly.

The fleeting friend, the kind that gold can buy,
Another's wealth can quickly take away;
Richer therefore than kings gem-crowned are we
Who count our steadfast friends through time and change.

The span of life is made of deeds, not years;
And those who shape our sorrows and our joys,
Who bring us days of peace ineffable,
Whose love and steadfast loyalty ne'er fail,
Exalt our lives and glorify our souls.

Old friends depart unto that unknown bourne,
Carried by the resistless tide of time,
But we find solace in the knowledge blest
That friendship is as deathless as the stars.

God give me friends—God help me hold them fast—
And may they find me faithful to the end!"

Sickness and Substitutes

A STATE report announces that tuberculosis has decreased in California during the past two years, while heart disease is on the increase.

This is quite natural. When there is disease—which is morbid matter in the body—it will break out in some form or other. An increasing number of physicians believe that the artificial attempt to suppress disease has been one of the leading causes of the great increase of late years of such diseases as cancer and diphtheria.

If the steam pressure in a boiler is too great, it will break out somewhere, and if you patch up one crack it will break out somewhere else, or blow the whole structure to smithereens. This is a simple fact which you would suppose any intelligent person—especially any intelligent person who makes a business of treating the sick—would understand. But they don't.

Appendicitis

THE appendix is a necessary organ. It lubricates the lower bowel. Removal of the appendix is always followed, sooner or later, by chronic constipation.

What is called "appendicitis" is inflammation of the bowel, caused by gross dietetic errors. Cutting out the appendix can never possibly cure, as it does not remove the cause.

Dr. J. H. Tilden writes:

"Surgeons continue to go after the appendix whether there is anything the matter with it or not. About ninety-five out of every hundred cases are not appendicitis at all.

"It is dangerous for anyone to have intestinal indigestion, constipation, colitis or ovarian irritation. They certainly will be run into the hospital and have their appendix removed or the gall bladder drained, or the ovary removed."

What a Blind Man Has Done

THE blind often accomplish things that put to shame those who enjoy the blessing of sight. Following is from Collier's:

"Augustine F. Massa is a student at the Columbia School of Law, New York. He holds one of the three scholarships offered in the law course. He is an officer in several student organizations. He is an expert chess and checker player and a member of the varsity wrestling squad. During his second year he won the intercollegiate heavyweight wrestling championship.

What of it, did you say?

"Well, Massa is totally blind. When he first tried to enter college he was rejected, but he asked for a trial in the University Extension courses, and at the end of one term won his place as a full-fledged student.

"Massa is entirely on his own. During the summer he earns money by playing exhibition chess and checker matches, often playing a dozen games simultaneously.

"Now, how big is the obstacle that is blocking your progress?"

Free Speech

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW has this to say about free speech, which is much endangered in the United States nowadays:

"Our whole theory of freedom of speech and opinion for all citizens rests, not on the assumption that everybody is right, but on the certainty that everybody is wrong on some point on which somebody else is right, so that there is a public danger in allowing anybody to go unheard."

Dr. Carl Schultz

DR. CARL SCHULTZ, celebrated his 73rd birthday, on the 27th of December. Dr. Schultz is the pioneer naturopath of Los Angeles. He was instrumental in getting the Naturopath bill through the State Legislature.

Dr. Schultz has one vice. He is intemperate in work. I told him he ought to take a rest, but he replied that he couldn't find anybody to take his place. This is probably true. Unfortunately, nowadays, a majority of physicians are more concerned in estimating how much they can get out of their patients, than in reckoning how many patients they can restore to health.

Sugar is a salt. Every salt is desiccating. Sugar is the most desiccating of all salts. It sucks up the liquids from the blood through the veins; thence comes the coagulation, then the solidification of the blood; thence the tubercles in the lungs; thence death. And this is why diabetes borders on consumption.—[Tholomyes in Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables."

Frank G. Carpenter

Everywhere Along the War Front in Belgium.—I am dating this letter "Everywhere Along the War Front." For the past few days I have been motoring in my Benz limousine with Jules at the wheel from town to town and from battlefield to battlefield, making notes of the rebuilding that has been going on here since the war. It began in 1918, and has so transformed the country that some of the tourist organizations have stopped taking their parties through the different salients because the signs of devastation have almost passed away.

Following in the Footsteps of the Germans

YOU all know how roughly Belgium was dealt with during the World War. She incurred the anger of the Germans by holding back their armies when they had prepared to pounce down upon Paris. In 1914 they had 1,000,000 men massed on the western frontier, and on August 4th they invaded the country. On August 5th they bombarded the forts of Liege with the biggest guns ever known up to that time, and within a week three of these forts had surrendered. In the meanwhile the British had waked up and were pouring in soldiers, the French were massed along their frontier, and the five German armies were so delayed by little Belgium that Paris was saved and the war eventually won by us and the Allies.

After entering Belgium the German forces divided. Some came on and occupied Brussels and thence made their way to Malines and Louvain to begin the short siege of Antwerp. Another force successfully bombarded Namur in the Valley of the Meuse, and on the 22nd of August came the great Battle of Mons, where the British with 76,000 infantry, 10,000 cavalry and 312 guns engaged 300,000 Germans and were gradually driven back step by step until they reached the Marne. But that is a part of the story of France.

After the Battle of Mons most of Belgium was evacuated by the British and French. Brussels had already been taken over by the Germans two days before. Malines had been destroyed by big guns, the cathedral of Louvain battered and its library of valuable manuscripts and 300,000 volumes systematically burned, and the troops were besieging Antwerp which was held by the Belgians under King Albert.

During the bombardment of Malines and Louvain hundreds of business buildings and private dwellings were reduced to dust and the same was true of a few hundred structures in Antwerp itself. During my travels I have visited each of these cities. Many of the buildings have been restored and in some cases much better ones created. The streets of Louvain are still filled with construction material, and a network of scaffolding poles, tied together with ropes, runs around the cathedral and the old library, and as far as the modern city is concerned the town will soon be in better shape than ever before. Many of them are of white stone and some have their walls decorated with carvings. All are in harmony with the old surroundings.

Louvain and the New American Library

LOUVAIN'S new million-dollar library, the funds for which are being raised by 640 colleges and universities in the United States, is fast going up and is to be completed in 1925. It is not on the site of the old one, but it faces the Place du Peuple, which is filled with old forest trees and there are large flower beds in one of the squares at the side. The design is by Whitney Warren, an American architect, and the building harmonizes with the typical architecture of Belgium. It will have two stories with a high ridged roof above which a huge bell tower will rise. Across the front are to be sunk great letters reading, "Furore Teutonica Diruta, Dona Americano Restituta" which means "Destroyed by Teutonic Fury, Restored by America's Gift." When I visited it last week the foundation of one corner had been laid and the brick and stone construction had risen to the first floor. Great quantities of red structural steel imported from America lay here and there inside the high board fence which surrounds the site. The stone cutters were busy and gangs of masons were at work. The building covers a full square of ground. It is on the highest land in the city and its tower will be seen for miles over the country.

Typical of "The New Belgium," which Frank G. Carpenter writes about in his letter next Sunday, is the library being built at Louvain with money given by American colleges to replace the one with its 300,000 books and priceless manuscripts that the Germans destroyed.

How The Germans Bombarded Antwerp

ON MY way to Antwerp I saw the place where the guns which sent shells as big around as a flour barrel a distance of ten miles into that city, were mounted. The site, I am told, had been fixed by the Germans before the war. They were set up on the foundation of a wooden villa which covered a bed of reinforced concrete of great thickness. The villa was taken away and these huge seventeen-inch guns, whose enormous size astounded the world, were placed there. The bombardment lasted thirty-six hours and during a part of this time the guns dropped a shell every minute. A gun could fire only a limited number of shells before it had to be allowed to cool. The damage done to Antwerp was small and the cathedral escaped, for the Germans expected to maintain the port as one of their great war stations of the future and to use it as Napoleon did when he said, "Antwerp is a loaded pistol that I hold against England's throat." In all only 700 buildings were destroyed, and some of them were such that the city was glad to have them removed. The Antwerp of today shows no signs of the war.

On October 9th, when Antwerp was surrendered by the Mayor, the Belgians and the British had left the city and fallen back upon Ghent, where two days later they retired. The Germans went on to take Ghent and Bruges, and within less than a week had reached Ostend, at which time the Belgian army was on the River Yser.

You may remember the great Battle of Yser which lasted ten days, the fight taking place upon the land, upon the sea and in the air. That was the first battle in which aviators were successfully employed; and it was the one in which the Belgians shot holes in the raised banks of the river, so that its waters, increased by the inflowing tide, spread over the country, inflicting severe losses upon their enemies.

On the Battlefield of "Wipers"

IT WAS at about the same time that the Battles of Ypres or, as the British Tommies called it, "Wiper's" began. The first shell descended on that town on October 7, and two days later 20,000 Germans passed through it. Six days after that the first British soldiers came in, and on October 19 the British met the Germans in a contest that lasted three weeks and resulted in the Germans losing 250,000 men and the Allies more than 100,000. Another battle took place there in 1915, and a third in 1917, when the British advanced and pushed back the Germans. In each of these battles there was fighting throughout the surrounding country which wiped out towns and villages and caused about the worst destruction that Belgium suffered during the war.

To understand the devastation one must recall Ypres of the past. More than two centuries before America was discovered the city had 200,000 inhabitants and was one of the richest industrial towns of the world. Its people wove woolen cloth, silks and velvets, and excepting the cathedrals, the Cloth Hall of Ypres was the finest building of the Middle Ages. It was used by the Drapers Guild as its warehouse and exchange. Another great structure was the Cathedral built about the same time, and connected with the Cloth Hall was the Nieuwerck, begun the same year that the Mayflower came to anchor near Plymouth Rock. All of these buildings and others were rich in carvings, paintings, stained glass windows, and valuable archives. The city itself, reduced by time to 18,000, or less than one-tenth of his former size, was a beautiful relic of artistic antiquity, proud of its history, but famous chiefly for its produce market, in which, on some Saturdays, more than 40,000 pounds of butter changed hands.

At the close of the war the city was deader than Sodom after Lot and his two loving daughters, well after sun-up, ran off to Zoar. The Cloth Hall and Cathedral were one mass of ruins. The houses had vanished, and the town was a "shell-swept graveyard." There are now 400 cemeteries scattered over the salient, and they contain 250,000 graves. The other day I rode by the cemetery of Poelcapelle where are buried 4000 bodies found in shell holes. On 3000 of the crosses above them are printed the words. "In memory of an unknown British soldier."

Immediately after the Armistice, the work of reconstructing Ypres was commenced. The first thing was to create a bright spot in the wilderness. This was done by clearing the public square and filling it with flowers and shrubs surrounded by grass and planting two rows of trees along the Boulevard Malon which leads from it. At the same time the people came back. Wooden structures of different types, from single-room sheds to temporary town halls, sprang up over night until in August, 1921, more than 12,000 had been erected. In the meantime brick and other materials became available and the construction of substantial houses commenced. During the war something like 4000 houses in Ypres were destroyed, and most of these have now been rebuilt.

But we can see this much better by getting into our German, war-built limousine, with our Belgian soldier Jules at the wheel, and going over the city as it is today. We stop the machine in the main street that runs through the town. There are huge piles of bricks and stone on both sides of the street and we can see new houses extending on and on. At our right is a yard where a dozen stone-cutters are hewing out building blocks and over the way the carpenters are putting up the rafters for new roofs of red tile. Huge wagons loaded with seem to be necessary to bring them into a state of perfect development.

CARE OF THE BODY

"Every one should know that the earth requires enough germ life to decompose and transpose its compose into a proper organism for the successful bringing forth of vegetation.

"Medical science is now pointing out, as the cause of disease, the changes that take place in the character of germ life. The fact of the matter is the cause antedates this germ change. As I stated above, when the human habitat is made pure—freed from germs—it becomes unfit for man. When this habitat begins to deteriorate the first life to show this change is germ life. All the germs named in works on bacteriology, which are given credit for having the specific property of creating disease, have taken on their peculiar toxic character because of the change in their environment.

"Instead of germs being recognized as the cause of disease, they should be recognized as the interpreters to man of the change that is taking place in his organism and habitat.

"A normal human animal has sufficient resistance to continue, with apparent immunity, in an environment which has caused germ life to take on a specificity recognized by bacteriologists as being capable of imparting its specific influence—disease—to the human being subjected to it.

"In every work on the germ theory I have ever read, and so far as I know, every writer who pretends to know anything about bacteriology iterates and reiterates the discovery, in healthy subjects, of specific germs, or germs laden with a specific power for creating disease.

"The pneumococci are often found in people who have not had pneumonia, and who probably will never have it. The diphtheritic germ can be found in the saliva of all people who frequent the busy marts of the city. Examples of 'Typhoid Mary' are to be found everywhere, and typhoid ferms are to be found in the intestines of people galore who have not had the disease. Whether they will ever have it or not remains to be seen. This being true, I insist that the bacteriologists prove my contention that the germs only emphasize, or indicate, as it were, the fact that there is a deterioration going on in the human habitat; and if this condition is not corrected, it may lead on until the change is so great that bodily resistance will no longer be able to maintain health; then the individual will have the disease he has the greatest predisposition to take on."

Psychological Piffle

AFTER extensive research over a period of years, and the testing of tens of thousands of adults and children, psychological "experts" announce that we do not progress mentally after the age of 15. "There is little mental growth after the age of 15," is the flat statement of the findings of these specialists.

That may be true of "experts"—especially medical experts—but it is silly when said of the average human being.

The brain, like other parts of the body, is developed through exercise.

Dietetics

"THE NEW DIETETICS," (The Modern Medicine Publishing Co., Battle Creek, Mich.,) is the latest book by [illegible] J. H. Kellogg. He has written many, [illegible] they are all worth reading.

This is a volume of 933 pages—almost an encyclopedia. It contains many valuable tables of food contents.

In his preface the author says:

"Within twenty years a new science of dietetics has been developed. As the result of the patient labors of many men, numerous mysteries have been cleared up, many hoary-headed theories have been exploded, and a great flood of light has been thrown upon one of the most important questions related to human existence.

"It is now possible to say with a considerable degree of certainty how much food is needed daily by a man, woman or child, at rest or at work, and to indicate what particular foodstuffs are best suited to meet any dietetic need which may be indicated in any condition of health or disease. It is also possible to state, with reference to every common foodstuff, what is its value as a source of energy, and what its special dietary properties and characteristics.

"In other words, there now exists a real science of dietetics, based on scientific facts worked out in laboratory researches, verified by animal feeding experiments and confirmed by clinical experience. Dietetics is no longer the jumbled mass of empirical notions of which it largely consisted even as late as two decades ago."

In future numbers I shall give my readers quotations from this book.

Exercise Your Muscles

FOLLOWING is from the Medical Summary:

For the act of expansion, muscles need space.

No person should be satisfied with his health until exercise yields a pleasant pull in all parts of the body. This is, of course, incompatible with round shoulders or flabby fat, and, if either of these conditions is present, a person should make a daily habit of postponing breakfast until noon and exercising as much as convenient during the morning.

As far as health is concerned, the mechanical invention, which adds speed to all work but removes necessity for manual work, is not an unmixed blessing. People find it increasingly necessary in their vacations to camp out in the wilderness, so they will be actually removed from conveniences for a period of weeks and exercise will be unavoidable.

A dance is sometimes more healthful than dinner. Exercise when the stomach is empty brings into play a variety of muscles that at other times are practically disused. By this method a person can make several discoveries about himself that he would not otherwise know and which will be all to the advantage of his health.

The benefit is, of course, gradual. When one unused muscle comes into play it has a good influence over the next connecting muscle. By this method all the advantages of manipulation can be realized, except in cases of helplessness, if persistence is the program adopted. The motion improved should be in all directions, up and down, side to side, and circular.

The benefit is not only to the large con-

San Diego's Priceless Mission Treasure

BY ALICE HARRIMAN

SCIMITAR-WIELDING Turks: Cross-wearing Padres. Mohammedan Cannon: Christian Bells.

If Father Anthony Ubach had not, in 1894, and after long consideration, recast bells belonging to what Fray Junipero Serra once affectionately referred to as "My poor little Mission de San Diego de Nipaguay," I never would have thought to join such violent antithises as these in opening an article about the San Diego Mission bells. No such diametrically opposite pictures as a futile Turkish assault on Vienna, the outpost of Christendom in 1683, and Father's Ubach's loving but futile attempt to restore the first Franciscan mission in California—western outpost of Christendom in 1769, would have been vouchsafed. No echoes of the same kind of metal, cast in differing forms,—echoing roar of cannon; echoing vesper chimes!

Sitting in the shade of gnarled old olive trees while sadly contemplating Mater Dolorosa, the 1000-pound recast of three old bells (1791, 1796, 1802,) perched on the west end of the fachada of the ruins of San Diego Mission, this flash of an apparently irrelevant bit of European history came to show me, as an unexpected flame from his camp fire reveals it to a weary prospector, the value of my slowly accumulating treasures. That my "nuggets" are washed from already well-worked-over mission ground makes them, to me, the more precious. I have found them. They are mine.

This illumination also brought the deeper thought that a change of viewpoint brightens many an otherwise unhappy hour. And, on this, my first visit to Mission San Diego de Alcala, I frankly was disconsolate. Although that recast held the same metal as its predecessors, its historic and campanological value was not the same, any more than a remodeled gown from the days of the dons can entice as did the original.

Golden-Tongued Bell Cast From Death-Dealing Cannon

BUT—why did the recollection of that Moslemic seige and the stubborn resistance of Christendom take away my anguish? Because, after the Turks were vanquished, great was their flight. So precipitate it was that 180 ornately cast bronze cannon were left on a gory plain. Authority, rejoicing that the Cross once more triumphed over the Crescent, appropriated the cannon. Sometime later, the emperor, Joseph, although history records but few smiles of his, smiled grimly to himself. He knew that church bells were anathema to the followers of Mohammed. The hate once entombed in those cannon should fling back the same in kind from a 40,000-pound bell. And it was done!

It seems almost worth while to have our old bells recast, if thereby we may learn, or, rather, realize anew, that their metal never had been in instruments of death nor destruction; that never, even in times of sore stress, have they flung out hate to any living thing.

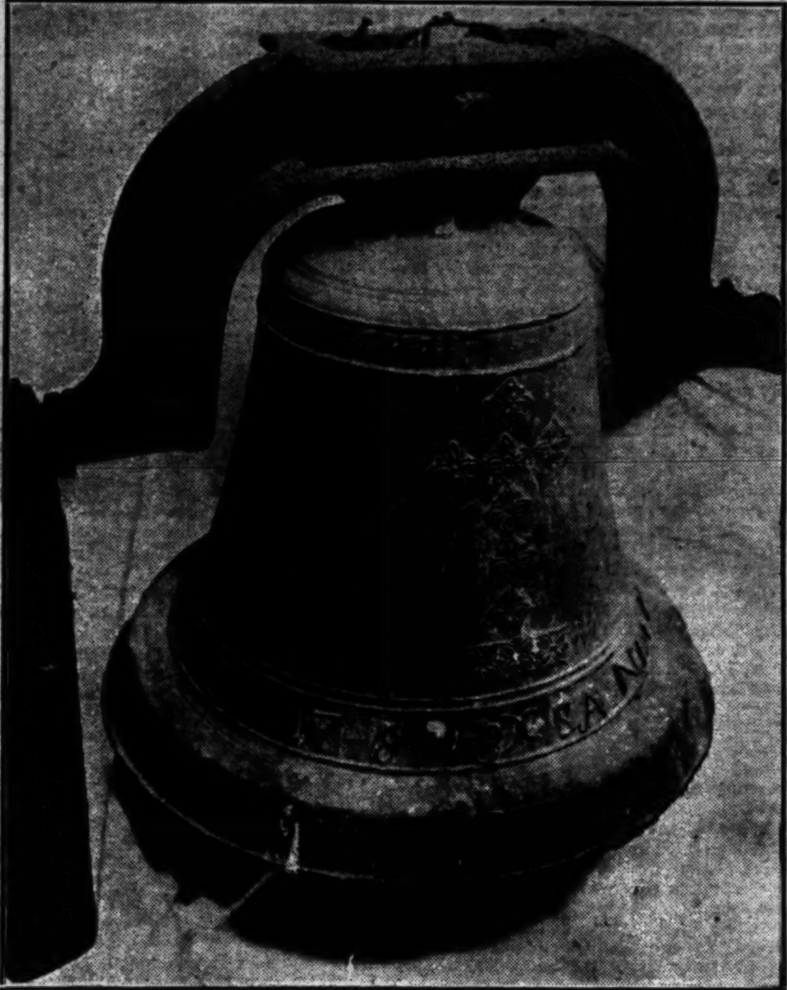
Fortunately but few mission bells have ever been recast, either at San Diego or otherwise. Fortunately, too, comparatively few were ever removed from their eeries on the spur of the moment; no matter how sharp that spur might be when secularization of the missions conduced to confusion, dismay and robbery. The remaining bells usually hang in groups; some held fast by raw-hide thongs; others by iron chains; a few solitary and alone. Those in groups are not attuned; and a clear hum-note, anywhere, is the exception.

As I wended a sunny way back to the original site of the mission, in fancy I stood beside Father Ubach as he watched the preparations for casting the new bell and cast a piece of silver into the cauldron, in true traditional manner. And, as each name and "Ave Maria" slowly melted and merged into the dull, molten mass, while the dates faded as fades the endless procession of days and centuries, I wondered if these same bells were those in which miscreant Indians once stuffed tumbleweed, so that no unwelcome call should summon them to work.

Then came the smile as the conclusion of that affair rose from out the visioned, bubbling metal: Neophytes lined up. Roll call. Swaggering responses suddenly turned to quavering prayers for mercy. Why, the very bells themselves told on their desecrators! How could the culprits know that the friars, shrewdly certain of their men, slyly manipulated the bell ropes?

"The Mission bells urge prompt confession;
With awe the humble Neophyte,
On bended knee, each morn and night,
Tells o'er his beads in deep contrition."

Later, sitting near the Father Serra Cross, which marks the historic hour of his advent, and overlooking the Presidio where tradition says, in 1857, hung nearly three-score tower bells for sale; I asked Angelo, heir to the estate of Campanero through his father, if he knew if any bells still remained that actually rung on Fray Serra's first visit after he went to Monterey. What did he know, generally, about the old bells and their present whereabouts?



Santa Maria Madalena, San Diego's priceless mission bell treasure.

Angelo's information ran something like this: As a mere boy he used to see twelve bells sitting on a pile of logs near the Estudillo home (now the alleged wedding-place of Ramona.) Later, there were eight on a rack. These dwindled to two, hanging from cross-barred uprights at the west end of the old chapel.

"We boys used to ring them, and then run away, fearing the priest."

"Where are they now—the bells?"

"Two are in the new church here in Old Town," with a wave of a brown hand accustomed to skillful pulling of bell ropes. "The rest—" a motion toward north and east.

Inner sight of ancient bells and sound of their trembling voices needed actual manifestation. I would go where such treasures might possibly be found! But for the moment the journey was shorter.

In the not ambitious tower of the "new church" in "Old Town" were bells to make hearts glad. The larger of the two, Ivan (Juan) Nepomeceno, had a crown top.

Mission Bells Donated by the King of Spain

WHEN Spain was financing the religious as well as the secular movement toward claiming and holding Alta California, she paid for part of the mission bells;—in other words, the King "donated" them; and such bells, I had read, were cast in the royal foundry at Barcelona.

Nepomeceno's crown not unnaturally indicated kingly origin; but noting the illiteracy of its "Ne po Meceno," and its comparatively poor casting, although it had an ornately florated cross and the usual Ave Maria Purisima, I concluded that its 600 pounds originated in San Blas, as had those of the recast, where the founder designed his own ideal for hanging the bell, with no thought of calling the top a crown—to him it was loops, or ears.

Although this bell of 1802 came to San Diego long years after Fray Serra passed to his merited reward, before I examined "Juan's" companion I bethought myself of the Father Presidente's request of the Viceroy when he asked for more bells. He evidently longed for rich-toned bells, for he concluded his memorial by saying: "I found those (bells) of San Blas were very clumsy and ugly, although I am unable to pronounce an opinion as to the quality of their tone, for they were not suspended, and I could not test them."

Although "San Juan" is neither clumsy nor ugly, it can, by no means, be said to be of a musical disposition; nor can its considerably smaller companion. But whoever cast the latter, with a cross of double squares and a three-eyeletted top for distinction, knew something of the difficulties of securing a true hum note. Perhaps he had been an apprentice in Flanders or Russia; for thousands of chisel marks are on the inside of the bell, thus showing how hard he tried to improve its tone. On no other bell along the Gray Friars' Road is there another indication of such desire; although there are several whose rich tones prove their founders were master-workmen.

Recalls Visit of the Portly, Good-Natured Alfred Robinson

WITH one hand resting on the sun-warmed rim of a bell, thus to retain an uncertain ledge-perch, my thought went back to a summer noon, in 1829, when pleasant-faced, portly Alfred Robinson of Boston, chanced to arrive at the mission as the bells were ringing for noon. It was a warm day; the corridors, with shadows of the arches silhouetted on the mission walls, stiflingly oppressive. Much had been made by some writers of an incident that then happened. Robinson, himself unobserved, watched a padre as, with knob-headed cane raised, he patiently waited the opportune moment to annihilate a leisurely fly. An absurd thing for a traveler to note? Yes. Still more absurd for me to recall it. Yes. Yet it is the homely little things of life that make, not only human history, but that of mission bells as well. To us of screened-in days and of every convenience and even luxury, the patience of a bothered friar—patience exercised just to be less harassed if even one fly could be removed should not be considered ludicrous—it was pathetic!

The weariness of the endeavor to uplift the natives, who were almost of the lowest type of the human race, by these studious, cultured Franciscans (descendants of men who, in great days, drove back the threatened Moorish invasion of Europe) from the schools, colleges and monasteries of Barcelona, Aragon, Majorca, Castile and Seville; the constant battling, not only with poor food, ignorance, licentious soldiery, worn-out clothing and arrogant and only too frequently arbitrary and maliciously inclined officials,—who knows but that these trials for all were for the moment objectified to Fray Fernando Martin by a pestiferous house fly!

There Is a Tangled Skein of History to Unravel

BUT in this research work, especially in the printed word, one soon becomes woefully aware that persons whose word one can hardly question, but infrequently agree. Unity of statement is almost as rare a find as is wire gold to a miner. As to the San Diegan bells, either at the mission or otherwise, I was confronted with Dana's statement that, in January, 1835, there were five large bells in the "five belfries," and an "Inventario General de las Existencias de la Mission de San Diego hecho el Dia de Sept. de 1834 (Existencia de la Iglesia,)" which was made after Governor Jose Figueroa issued his decree of secularization on Aug. 9, 1834.

In this phonetically spelled inventory, evidently made by some unlettered Californian, is mentioned:

2 Campanas de bara, a bronze, a 100 ps	200
1 Campana de idem, a 50 ps..........	50
1 Campanita, a 15 ps................	15
3 Campanillas, a 1 ps...............	3

Then there were the fifty-seven, said to have been for sale in the Presidio in 1857,—fifty-seven bells, despite the fears of Senorita Apolineria Lorenzana, who, in 1848, wrote from San Juan Capistrano to the Father Presidente, Jose Joaquin Jimero, about the fate of valuables belonging to the despoiled San Diego Mission, and it seems quite plain that she means tower bells when she speaks of "others in the smithy . . . already broken to pieces."

How about it? Where should I find the truth? Exactitude, the name only too infrequently may be written after some historical statements, for history is largely made up of hearsay or sense impressions—neither always accurate.

Matters Much Mixed by Political And Other Changes

IN THIS case, is it not well to recall that after 1831-2 the padres would hardly have hoisted heavy bells to those already in the tower; for, by then, important and disquieting changes were already being made in the ecclesiastical and political government of California. And if, in the resulting upheavel, bells from other missions found their way to the dusty Presidio, and from whence many went into "smithy" or caldron for the silver firmly, if always mistakenly, believed to be in them, I, at least, had located five genuine mission bells; and hoped to find still others of those Angelo, the bell-ringer, had seen as a boy.

With this in mind I went hither and you, as directed by many. But not until dear old Father Mesney's dim eyes looked down long corridors of well-spent years, did I get any assurance of success.

"When St. Joseph's was dedicated," he began, slowly, "we put, I think—I am not sure—one of the old bells with the new ones. To teach them," he twinkled, "how to speak."

Might I climb St. Joseph's imposing tower? I might. Might I have a guide—someone to carry the camera?

"Certainly, my child."

walks ten or fifteen miles every day, while the great inventor finds that he needs little or no exercise to keep him in good health and practically takes none except his necessary steps in his routine work in his large laboratories.

"Eustace Miles is another man whose remarkable powers of both mental and physical endurance have scarcely excited the attention they deserve. . . . Mr. Miles has lived on a dollar a week, and that too when in hard training. I quote from the words written a few years ago: 'Last year I coached about twenty pupils in Cambridge; I wrote over twenty books and a great many articles. And at any time I was ready to go it at a moment's notice and play a hard racquet match.' He was once unhealthy, but since adopting an abstemious dietary has had practically no illness for four years, has always been in training and seldom has been obliged to stop his brain work during the whole period. For years Mr. Miles was the amateur racquet champion of the world, successfully defending the title against all competitors, as well as against his own advancing age.

"Dr. J. H. Kellogg of the Battle Creek Sanitarium is another example of enormous energy and administrative powers maintained on a meager diet. Two meals a day of probably four to five ounces of cereals, nuts and fruits (never any meat) sustain the activities of a man who has made an impression on the life and thought of this age. He has great skill as a surgeon and remarkable power as an administrator and man of business. His hours of sleep are probably no longer than Mr. Edison's and, like him, he performs an almost incredible amount of work.

"J. P. Riley of the Barrett Manufacturing company in New York, when traveling or working hard, may go without food for thirty-six hours or more without discomfort and without bad effects. He has worked for a considerable period at the rate of eighteen hours a day, with only three or four hours' sleep. He used to be a long-distance runner and expected to go into training last summer to run ten miles, which he hoped to do in an hour or less. He never has a day's sickness, nor do any of his four children. . . .

"The Alaskan Indians eat only once a day after their work is done, and they can carry a pack and march or run from sixty to one hundred miles in a stretch. Mark Twain, except for a little coffee and toast for breakfast, never ate until 7 p.m.

"Prof. Fisher knows of a poor singer who lived in New York City for a whole year on $35 for food. And was he broken down and sick? Not at all; he was in prime condition at the end of the twelve months. . . .

"Senator La Follette's diet is as follows:

"Breakfast: Two whole wheat biscuits and milk; no tea or coffee.

"Luncheon: Milk, crust of bread or zweibach and perhaps a few English walnuts.

"Dinner: A dozen or two English walnuts, some fresh vegetables, particularly asparagus and spinach. Never any meat.

"On this diet the Senator became from a physical wreck as robust a specimen of a 160-pound fighter as the world could show, capable of unlimited exertion, of unquestioned courage and unbounded nervous energy.

"Markall, the English pedestrian, over 80 years old, only eats two meals a day, while Immanual Kant wrote his 'Critique of Pure Reason' on one meal a day. Two hundred and fifty students of the Missouri University found their wits sharpened and their physical condition improved by eating only two meals a day. . . .

"Prof. Chittenden's experiments prove that the average man eats from two to three times as much meat as he needs to keep him in perfect health and vigor.

"It is quite evident that the men of our time who have shown energy, capacity and endurance beyond all their contemporaries have not accomplished this because they have taken more food than the average man or woman. On the contrary, it is because they have learned to live on much less. If food supports life and develops energy in direct proportion to the amount consumed, as it is popularly supposed to do, the largest eater ought to be the most efficient man. The ascertained facts, however, are all against this conclusion. When an Edison, a Miles, a Weston, a Kellogg, a La Follette and thousands of others now living add the practical testimony of their daily lives to the teachings of the philosophers and statesmen of all ages, that man, generally speaking, subsists on one-quarter of what he eats, and carries about the remaining three-quarters at the price of his health, his energy and at least a portion of his allotted lifetime; it would seem that we should pause and take heed to our ways.

"Perhaps most or all of us are what Mr. Edison calls 'food drunkards.'"

The Truth About Germs

FOLLOWING is from an article by Dr. J. H. Tilden, in the Philosophy of Health:

"As I have pointed out time and again in various articles on the subject of germs, we live in an atmosphere laden with germ life. As soon as the atmosphere is made pure (?) —freed entirely from germ life—it is no longer fit as a habitat for human or animal life. The first life to feel the effects of the unwholesomeness of a human habitat are the micro-organisms which populate it; and just in proportion as this human habitat deteriorates from an ideal standard of health, life deterioration goes on, starting, as stated above, with a perversion of the germs, which are necessary to the full maintenance of health of the human animal.

"This is not peculiar to man. When we become acquainted with the life and habitat of flowers, vegetables, grains, etc., we learn that these different types of life evolve into perfection just in proportion as their habitat is peopled by those organisms which

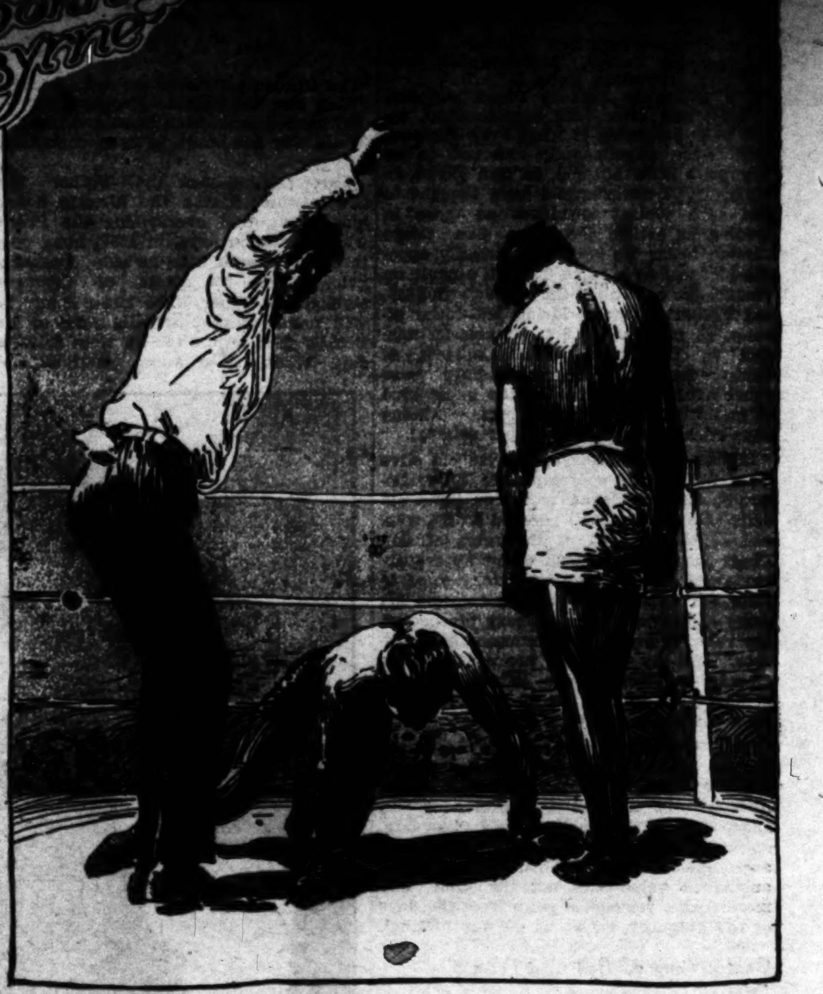
By Donn Byrne



He heard some one say, "Three—four—"

EASTWARD the line of Twenty-fourth street flowed evenly like a sluggish river, hazy, dim, antique, mottled by the lights of the little shops, of blotches and shafts of yellow illumination from the glass panels of the old houses, iron railings and small scrofulous gardens. Past the old houses, at the junction of Seventh avenue and the street, came an irregular blaze, a sort of ochre ray, from a cellar where an Italian had a coal, ice and wood business; the glare of the cigar store; the thin spray of the news stand kept by the fat, rather dirty old German woman; the pale, sinister windows of the Chinese restaurant, and the arrogant blaze from Slavin's saloon.

At no time did the street appear so well as it did now, in the dusk of the early New York spring. The darkness, which was not full darkness, but a sort of blue mantle, threw a veil of illusion over it, and through the veil the lights came softly. Before the dusk it was crude realism, and when night would fall there would be sinister shadows. But now it had a little beauty. It was like a picture a painter might have done some centuries ago, an unimportant and rather brutal picture, and time and grime and proper lighting had given it such value that one would pause before it for an instant, not knowing why the charm.

The old man sitting in the doorway of one of the little houses with the yellowish patch of grass surrounded by warped iron railing hated the street with the dull, cold hatred of old men. Yet he couldn't get away from it. Often his son had suggested, and his wife, when she had been alive, had suggested, that they move to the country. "Yerra, do ye call that country?" he had snarled at the mention of Westchester and Long and Staten islands, and that had killed the suggestion; and they had tried to have him move uptown, to Harlem, but "Yerra, what would I be doing up there?" he had rasped. The son had spoken of the pleasant places in Brooklyn, out Flatbush way. "Yerra, is it Brooklyn?" What impression he had of that worthy borough is hard to imagine, but he spoke with a devastating contempt.

The truth was, the old man was wedded to Twenty-fourth street. He was like some of his race who have ancient, uncomely wives whom they despise and hate but without whom they cannot live. There was the place it was fated for him to be. There was the shop where he got shaved every morning. There was the saloon where he had his three drinks a day, regular as the clock—one before lunch, one before dinner, and one before he went to bed. There was the news stand where he snapped the daily paper from the hands of the old German woman. If an elevated train on Seventh avenue were late, he would notice it. He had decided to be there, and there he remained.

To the eye the old man was a forbidding, a cold figure. It was more this forbidding and cold quality that made him old, rather than years. He could not have been much over 50. But this fixity of habit, this impression of being a monument, had endowed him with antiquity. He was not a big man, but he gave the impression of size, of importance. His hair was gray, and that gave him dignity. His eyes were of a colorless, aloof blue, the blue of ice. His gaunt, clean shaven face had something ecclesiastical about it. His clothes were always a decent and expensive black, and a heavy gold watch chain spanned his vest. He had always a stick by his side. His shoes were good and roomy and somewhat old fashioned. His hat was of black hard felt, not a derby, nor yet a high hat, but one of those things that suggest property and respectability and, somewhow, land. His name was Mr. McCann.

The social standing of Mr. McCann on Twenty-fourth street was something of a phenomenon. Every one accorded him a sort of terrified respect. The Italian coal and wood man; the German news agent; the man in the cigar store where he indulged in his only vulgarity, plug tobacco, which he cut with a penknife and crumbled in the palm of his hand; the bartender in Slavin's, who fixed his drinks to a nicety and had a cheery and respectful "Well, Mr. McCann?" for his each entry. The street recognized he was of them, but immensely superior. He was not a gentleman, so the respect was not from caste to caste, but something much more real. None ever became familiar with him, nor would any sane man think of insulting him. Aloof and stern, with terrible dignity, he moved through the street. Even the children hushed as he drew near.

None in the street ever examined their hearts or minds as to why he was paid their tribute of respect. If they had, they would have found no reason for it, but they would have paid it to him all the same. He was Mr. McCann.

And this was all the more strange because he was father of Irish Mike McCann, between whom and the middleweight boxing championship of the world there stood only two men. Irish they loved; were proud of. But it wasn't to the father of Irish that the respect was paid. It was to Mr. McCann.

A very strange thing about Mr. McCann was this: that he could only know time and space and circumstance in relation to himself. As thus: Seventh avenue was not Seventh avenue to him, a muscular, grimy street that plodded for a space on the west side of Manhattan, crashed northward through the Twenties, galloped toward Forty-second, crossed Broadway recklessly, and at Fifty-ninth met the armed front of the Park, died. To Mr. McCann it was only an artery that crossed his street. Also, winter was not winter, not the keenness of frost, the tumbling, swirling miracle of the snow, but just the time when he put on his overcoat. Nor did summer mean the blossoming of the boughs to him, nor the happy population on the river and the beach and the little Italians with their ice cream carts, nor children crooning over great segments of watermelon, but just a time when it was oppressively hot. And great national events marked only points in his life. He would not say, for instance, that he was married about the time of the war with Spain, but the Maine was sunk about the time he was married.

All his life was under his eyes, like a map one knows perfectly—a rectangular pattern. There were no whorls, no arabesques. There were no delicate shadings, no great purple splash, but precise black and white. There were no gaps he had jumped, to be a mystery in his latter years. All was evident.

He could see himself in his boyhood on the Irish hills, among the plain farmer family he was born of. He could place his father, plain old tiller of the soil, always smoking a clay pipe; his mother, warm-hearted, bustling, a great one for baking bread; his brothers and sisters, honest clods. But he himself seemed to have been born superior, was superior. There was no mystery. It was a fact. He accepted it. And from him his mother accepted it.

And by his mother it was impressed on the whole family that their son and brother, Dennis, was superior. For him better clothes, easier work, and when he decided that farm life was not for him no objection was made to the sending of him to college in Cork. But after a couple of years there he had made no progress with studies and it seemed to him that the studies were not worth while. And he returned home.

They had tried to get a government office for him then; a very small one. But that also required examinations, which he could not seem to pass. So that a great contempt for books grew up within him. And then he grew convinced that Ireland had not enough opportunity for him. And the family got the money to send him to America.

The years at the college in Cork had intensified his sense of superiority, so that when he came to America he felt that the Irish he met there were a very inferior people. And nothing about the city pleased him—everything was much better in Ireland, he decided, and said Ireland was a wonderful country—the only thing wrong with it was the people. And the queer thing about it was that the Irish in New York agreed with him. His few years at Cork gave them the impression he had accumulated learning, and the race has a medieval respect for books and writing. "True for you, Mr. McCann; true for you," they would answer his remarks on the inferiority of the Irish Irish. "But what can you expect and the centuries of oppression they have been under?" "If they had independence enough there would have been no oppression." "Ay, there's a lot in what you say, Mr. McCann."

His superiority disarmed them, cowed them. If one of themselves or a foreigner had uttered the words I can imagine the rush, the dull thud, the door being taken from its hinges, the mournful procession to the widow's house.

This aloofness, this superiority helped him, or rather made him, in the business he had chosen—life insurance. The wisdom he uttered about life and death to a race who considers life only as the antechamber of eternity impressed his hearers, and they were afraid, too, not to take out policies from this superior, frigid, and evidently authoritative young man.

His superiority also brought him a wife, a timid, warm-hearted girl, who brought a tidy sum of money as a fortune, which he spent upon himself.

She was terrified of him and very much in love with him for years. And then the love went and the terror remained. She bore him three children, two sons and a daughter. And in due time she died. But not until life had run pleasantly and respectfully for her husband, for all that he despised it, not as vanity and affliction of spirit but as inferiority and irritation.

And one son died, and a while after her mother's death Moyra, the daughter, ran away, contracting a very inferior marriage with a brakeman on the Pennsylvania Railroad. And the time came when the old man had to retire from the field of insurance, new methods, new companies coming in. The native Irish died of consumption and pneumonia, and the Irish-Americans cared not a tinker's curse for superiority. So his kingdom vanished. And Poles, and French, and Italians, and the folk who came from Palestine by way of Russia, and even Chinese jostled him. And he was left, with a great sense of superiority and a growing sense of futility and one son, "the brilliant Irish-American middleweight, contender for the world's championship, 'Irish' Mike McCann!"

All there was needed now, the old man felt, to crown a useful and superior life was a material reward. Money he didn't care for—he had all he wanted, decent clothes, a house, tobacco, his three drinks a day, and The Advocate, an Irish weekly, he read for news of people in Cork, puzzling out this genealogy and that. As, for instance, he would read of a Patrick Murphy fined for drunkenness at Youghal, and he would say: "I wonder now would that be a son of ould James Murphy of Balligure. Sure, I wouldn't put it past him. A damned drunken family they always were." Or a name in litigation would strike him. "Them Hamiltons were always the ones for going to law. A dirty connection!" If a pier or a piece of public property was being builded his comment was: "I wonder who's getting the money out of that." If a political speech was reported he would sneer: "Yerra, John Redmond and them fellows ought to be ashamed of themselves and them plundering the people with their tongues in their cheek." The Advocate was a great comfort to him.

He often thought, and he reading it, of how much he would like to return to Ireland and show the ignorant the fruits of a superior life led in hard work and wisdom. But for that he would have to show something tangible—even money would not be enough, so queer those people were. To impress them at all he would have to have a title of some kind: Alderman, or Judge, or Sheriff, "the Honorable Dennis McCann," and to have that he would need to have gone into politics, and that was not a career for him. To succeed there he would have to be able to mix with the common people, drink with them, be hail-fellow-well-met with a crowd of the dirtiest kind of Irish.

No, he could never have done that.

No, but his son might have. Sure, why couldn't he? Wasn't he reared right among them? And though he came from a superior house, sure, that would only be an advantage. They would look up to him as well as be friends with him. And with the brains he ought to have, considering his father, there was no office in the land for which he couldn't be fitted. Surrogate, or Mayor, or Governor even! What was to prevent him if he'd been the sort of child he ought to have been?

And if he had been that, there would have been a monument for the old man. There would have been a justification for his life—not that he felt he needed any, but just to show. And people would have recognized how much the young one owed to the old one. Then he could have gone back to Ireland for a visit—he wouldn't have stayed there: it was a good country to come from, as he always said. But even the ignorant common people would have given him credit. He could hear them now talking to his son: "Ah! sure, if your Honor's father had had the chances you had, sure it isn't Mayor of New York he'd be, but President of America." "Yerra, 'tis easy to see where you get the brains, my lad. A chip equal in learning and skill, and who have just begun their professional careers. Dr. Easy puts his card on his door and in the newspapers, and then sits down in his office and waits patiently for patients. If, fortunately, somebody is good enough to break a leg or to be seized with the cholera at his very door, he secures a customer; otherwise he may spend years in putting knowledge into his head by study before he will put any money into his purse.

"Not so with Dr. Push. He has a mean opinion of the passive system, and not only puts up a stunning brass plate on his door, but gets himself puffed in the newspapers, salaams to all the 'big wigs' of his town, dresses in the height of fashion, talks learnedly of borborygmus and asphyxia, looks wise as an owl, and keeps a splendid turnout, or 'two-forty' horse and carriage, before he has a visit to make.

"He hires persons to startle his neighbors at midnight with the peals of his bell; is continually called out of church; and, more than once, has had his name shouted, as being instantly wanted, while attending a concert or lecture at the Academy of Music. Instead of sitting down in his office and dozing over Brodie and Magendie, he scours the streets and the whole adjoining country with his carriage, driving from morning till night at a killing pace, as if life and death hung on his steps; and, neglecting no form of advertisement, is probably charging $2000 a year before Dr. Easy has heard the rap of his first patient. Now, of the two men, Dr. Push may be the humbug; but he certainly is not the fool."

Diet, Health and Endurance

FOLLOWING is from an article by Richard Cole Newton, M.D., published several years ago in the Dietetic and Hygienic Gazette:

"If we expect to win a race, the first thing we do is to train for it. And how does one train? He puts himself upon a strict diet; he takes the proper amount of exercise and sleep, and foregoes everything that may be detrimental to his training. No matter what a man's muscular strength or peculiar skill may be, he cannot hope to win a championship contest without careful training. If, then, the training is necessary for a mere contest of skill and endurance, is it not also necessary for the race of life? Probably most people would answer yes; yet to judge from the life-habits of the average man, no one seems to know how to train for life's battle. Is this ignorance universal? Are there no men who know how to live so that they may attain the highest efficiency? An examination into the life-habits of some of the men who have startled the world by their genius, their knowledge, or their endurance, will show that they, measurably at least, have learned to live so as to conserve and augment their natural powers until the end of their lives.

"In no one respect do efficient people seem to differ from the average person so markedly as in their diet. The latter clings fondly to the cherished delusions of bygone ages and refuses to believe that man should not eat everything that pleases his palate and in the largest possible quantities. Furthermore, he resorts freely to appetizers and condiments in order to increase an appetite already perverted and coaxed into a constant and abnormal craving for tasty morsels and highly seasoned dishes.

"Lately, however, we espy here and there a man who eats to live and lives to work. Mr. Edison is frequently referred to as an abstemious man. What are the facts? Whatever he eats it is always in very minute quantities, his diet being about one-half that recommended by Rabagliatti, Sager and other writers on diet, who have been considered extremely rigorous in their views. . . .

"Mr. Edison was brought up on the teachings of Cornaro, who, as is well known, lived to be 98 or 99, on a diet of twelve ounces of mixed food and less than a pint of light wine a day, and to these teachings he attributes his wonderful endurance and executive capacity. He also chews all his carbohydrate and vegetable food after the rule laid down by Horace Fletcher. And what have been the results in Mr. Edison's case? Of his world-renowned inventions everybody knows. But it is less generally known that he claims that he has worked for twenty hours a day, almost every day, for thirty years and now he works from fifteen to eighteen hours daily, only sleeping [illegible] hours at night. [illegible] has been sick but three times in his more than threescore years, has had only three or four headaches in his life, and one cold in the past ten years. Apparently it is chiefly owing to his meager diet that he has been able to accomplish a simply incalculable amount of work. He has devoted his life to his inventions and everything has been made subsidiary to them.

"Weston, the pedestrian, follows nearly as strict rules of life as Mr. Edison. He declares that if a man takes uniformly good care of himself there is not the slightest need of special training for any contest, and that he has never trained for a single day. The explanation of his superb condition is simply the regularity of his habits and the simplicity of his fare. His breakfast consists of bread and coffee. He takes no luncheon. For dinner he has about a quarter of a pound of meat and two potatoes. Instead of the meat he may eat sparingly of fish or poultry. He avoids pastry and rich viands of all kinds.

"Like Mr. Edison he sleeps less than most people, spending about six hours in bed at night, with a nap in the daytime. Still he of the ould block." "Dennis McCann's son, [illegible] him Governor of the Empire State. [illegible] God for [illegible] would have."

There would have been an evidence for him, an evidence he was entitled to.

And look you, the dirty trick had been played on him. Instead of the son who would crown his gray hairs with honor, who would justify him, he was father to a common prize fighter, a man who was not looked on with respect by any. The idol, perhaps of the New York Irish, but of the ignorant Irish. True, he was a good boy; he didn't drink. But neither did his father, except in reason. He was generous with his money but after all what was money? Always smiling, always laughing—"Sonny" they called him, and "Irish"; that was no way to attain dignity. Even the Italian coal-ice-and-wood man called him "Irish." The old man would like to see anyone call himself "Irish."

And he couldn't listen to any reason. The old man had an opening for him in business uptown. A friend of his, an undertaker, a very superior man, who only did the best kind of trade, had offered young Michael a chance. But the prize fighter had laughed.

"In a way I'm in that line of business myself. Why change?"

The old man had shaken with rage.

"Get out of my sight, you impertinent pup!"

What were they thinking of him in Ireland at all, at all? Some one, of course, would write home and tell all about it. And if his name, that should be treated with respect, came up, some one would laugh, "Ould Dennis McCann! Ah, sure, what's he anyway? Sure his son's only a common fighter."

He could never get away from it; was never let get away from it. Why, even to night now, not a half mile away at Madison Square Garden, Michael was fighting. And a great fuss they were making about it, too. Some Italian he was fighting, and if he won he was to get a fight with the champion. He'd probably win—he always did—and beat the champion, too. And the end of it would be the honorable name would be dragged more through the dirt of the newspapers.

"I wonder will he forget to bring home The Advocate?" the old man thought.

"He'd better not."

Before the bell had gone for the first round, before the referee had called them together for instructions, before even the gloves were laced on him, Irish knew he was a beaten man.

Below him—he could see from his corner of the ring—the great garden was packed, a yellowish gray foam of faces above the dark liquid of bodies. Above those the galleries were great ovals lined with faces. And here and there were little tendrils of smoke. And the red caps of attendants. And occasionally the flash of metal buttons as police and firemen hovered in the aisles.

And at the shelf around the ringside reporters with their pencils and paper, and telegraphers with their clicking instruments. The timekeeper, fingering watch and gong. In another corner of the ring the thin, lugubrious referee—himself once a famous lightweight. And everywhere lights, that in a minute or so would go out, and there would only be a great blue one over the ring. And over the house was the rippling hush that at any instant would burst into a great volume of cheers; a deep roar, as of gunnery.

Across the ring, in his corner, the Italian middleweight lolled, chatting with his seconds. Irish could occasionally glimpse the olive body; the dark hair and eyes; the even, grim face, unmarked save for the marred left ear and the minute flattening of the nose.

". . . between the leading contenders of the world's middleweight championship, Nick Chip" (so they had Americanized Niccolo Chiapetta) "of Buffalo and Irish Mike McCann . . ." and the sentence was lost in the roar of the Garden.

As he came to the center of the ring for the referee's instructions, to hear the interpretation of the rules of hitting while holding and about what was and what was not a clinch, he studied the alert, smiling Italian. Yes, Chip was far and away the best man he had ever met; too good for him, much too good—if he had only waited a year, waited six months, even; five or six months more of stiff, good fighting, and he could have taken the Italian easily. A little more experience and a little more confidence, if he could only have waited.

But he couldn't wait; he couldn't afford to. Neither he nor the old man could afford to.

They shook hands and returned to their corners. [illegible] out.

"Don't box him, Irish. Stay with him. Get in close, and when you get him open, [illegible] just beat!" old Maher, his trainer, whispered as he ducked out. "See, no fancy stuff. Just sock him. How are you feeling, Irish?"

"Fine."

"'At 'e baby!"

Bong-g-h! He turned and walked to the center of the ring.

The Italian had dropped into his usual unorthodox pose. His open right glove fiddling gently at the air, his left arm crooked, the glove resting against his left thigh. He moved around the ring gently, like a good woman dancer. About him was an immense economy of movement. He seemed wide open—a mark for any boxer's left hand. But Irish knew better. The Latin would sway back from the punch and counter like lightning. The old champion was wise to lie low and not to fight this man until he was compelled to.

If he could only spar him into a corner and rush him there, taking the punches on the chance of smashing him on the ropes, but, the Italian glided around like a ghost. He might have been some sort of wraith for shadow boxing, except for the confident, concentrated eyes.

A minute's fiddling, shifting of position, light sparring. The creaking of the boards, the shuff, shuff, shuff of feet.

"Ah, why don't you walk in and kill him, Irish. He's only a Guinea!" came a voice from the gallery.

"He's a yellow. He's a yellow, da Irish," an Italian supporter jeered.

Irish could wait no longer. He feinted with his left, feinted again. The left shot out, missed the jaw, came home high on the head. The right missed the ribs and crashed on the Latin's back. A punch jarred Irish on the jaw. An uppercut ripped home under his heart. At close quarters the Italian was slippery as an eel. The Garden roared delight at the Irish punches, but Irish knew they were not effective. And the Italian had hurt him; slightly, but hurt him.

A spar, another pawing rush; light, smart blows on the ropes. "Break! Break!" The cry of the referee. Creaking of ropes and whining of boards. A patter of applause as the round came to an end. A chatter of voices as the light went up. The clicking of telegraph instruments.

"'At 'e boy! Keep after him," Maher greeted.

As he sat down in his corner Irish was grim. Yes, the Italian was too good for him; he had been afraid of this: that the Italian would outgeneral him into attacking all the time. A little more experience, the fights that mean a hundred times the theory, and he would have lain back and forced Chip to stand up and face him instead of sniping him on the run. The confidence of six or seven more fights, and it wouldn't have mattered to him what the gallery was shouting, what the ringside thought. He could have made Chip stand up and fight, and in a round or so the Garden would have been with him.

If he had only had a little more experience—if only he had been able to wait.

Ah, well, what was the use of grousing. He was here to fight.

"Can't you rough him up a little in the clinch, Irish?" Maher whispered.

"No, I'll fight him fair."

"Just a little, to get his goat."

"No."

The lights went out, leaving only the great glare of the ring. The whistle blew; clatter of buckets and bottles. The seconds clambered down. The gong clashed, shuddering. The second round.

He walked slowly forward over the white canvas under the bluish white arc light to meet his man, and then suddenly from his walk he jumped, as some jungle thing might jump. He jumped without setting, without any boxer's poise. Right for the poised, alive body he jumped. And his hands hooked for drive and uppercut. He could feel the sense of shock as they both went home, but to unvital points. The left hand thudded on the neck. The right crashed on the Italian's left arm. He was in close now, driving short lefts and rights to the body, but he was handling something that bent and sprang back like whalebone, that moved, swayed with suppleness like some Spanish or Argentine dancer, and soon elbows locked his arms subtly and he could do nothing.

"Come on, break!" The referee was trotting about the ring like a working terrier. Peering, moving from right to left. "Break! Break!" His voice had the peculiar whine of a dog on a scent.

He stood back, sparred a moment. Again Irish rushed. He left on either side of his [illegible] caught him flush on the ear. A tattoo like taps of little hammers played on his body. Irish's right glove came full into the Italian's ribs. He could feel the rush of air through the Italian's teeth. He brought the hand up with a short chop on the Italian's neck. A scuffle; a semiwrestle. And again his arms were locked.

"Come on, boys. Come on. Break quick."

They stood apart, sparred. Irish feinted with the left hand. Feinted with the right. Changed feet quickly, right foot foremost now. Pivoted home with the left hand—Joe Walcott's punch. The Italian sidestepped, and caught him on the ear as he swung to the ropes. Irish turned quickly. A flurry of gloves. Light lead and counter. Clinch.

"You're good, Nick!"

"Y' ain't so bad yourself, Irish."

As the bell finished the round and he walked toward his corner he was surprised, looking down at himself, to find angry, red weals on his body where what he thought was a light tattoo had been beaten . . .

Yes, he thought between rounds, another little while, another pound of experience, and for all his cunning, his generalship, he could have beaten Nick. And then between him and the championship there would have been only the champion, and the old champion's day was past. He was getting fat, and satisfied and drinking—and that was bad! And going around the country to Boston and New Orleans and Seattle, beating third-raters and then mainly on points, and lying low, very low indeed, whenever Nick Chip's name was mentioned, or even his, Irish Mike McCann. Only another six months and he could have taken on the men the champion had beaten: Pal Kennedy of Pittsburg, and the clever Jewish lad who went by the Irish name of Al Murphy that fight would have taught him a lot—and the Alabama Kid, the hunched Negro middleweight who hit like a flail, and Chicago Johnny Kelly—who fought with his right hand first, a hard lad to reach, but he could have beaten him. Could have beaten them all.

He wanted to be champion—knew he could be, with time and experience. And what there was for him in the championship was not personal glory and not money, but a strange pride of ease that was hard to explain. All he could do well was this athletic feat of fighting with gloves. There was intuition, a sort of gift. His body balanced right. His left had moved easily. His right was always in position. All his fights he had won easily. But he had never yet been up against anyone as good as this Italian veteran.

It seemed to him only right than an Irishman—or an Irish-American, which was better still—should hold the middleweight and heavyweight championships. Fighting—clean, hard struggle—was the destiny apportioned to them. He knew enough of the history of his race to remember they had fought under every banner in Europe—the Irish Brigade of Fontenoy, and the men who were in the Pope's Zouaves, and Russia and Germany knew them, and the great regiments the English had, Munsters and Leinsters and Enniskillen Dragoons and in New York was the beloved Sixty-ninth, the Fighting Sixty-ninth.

Vaguely in his mind there were thoughts which he could not translate into words, it not being his craft, that there was some connection between the men who fought in a padded ring with gloves and the men who went gallantly into battle with two flags above their heads, the flag they served faithfully and the little wisp of green they loved. The men in the ring stood for the green in the field, perhaps. And we should see in the Irish boxer what the cheering ranks of Irish going into battle were. Fight squarely in the ring, fight gallantly, fight to the last drop, and win gallantly, and lose gallantly. And let no man say: there is a dirty or mean fighter; and let no man say: there is a coward.

There were Irish names in the ring that made old men's hearts flutter and young men wish they had been born years before. Old John L. Sullivan (God rest the gallant battered bones!) and Tom Sharkey of Dundalk, who never knew when he was beaten, and old Peter Maher, who was somewhere in the house. And there was another name in the mist of past days, the name of a middleweight champion who had been greatest and most gallant of them all, the elder Jack Dempsey, the Nonpareil. None like him, none! Irish of the Irish, most gallant of them all, he sleeps in a green grave in the West somewhere, and in all men's hearts.

And [illegible] thought [illegible] well, and in his corner [illegible] the ghost of the great Nonpareil would be. And the roar of the house as he would walk out at the referee's call, the champion, Irish-American, in his tights of green, and around his waist the starry western flag.

Ah, well!

The shrill cut of the whistle, and the chief second leaned forward and wiped his face.

"Fift' round, Irish. Keep at him, boy!"

The gong, and the hushed house.

He noticed now that the Italian fighter was no longer resting his left hand semicasually on his hip, kept up no longer his poise of an Argentine dancer. The Buffalo man's left hand was extended like an iron bar, his shoulder hunched to his jaw for a shield, his head sunk low, as a turtle's head is half drawn under its carapace; his feet well apart. The man's oily black hair was a tangled mop, and on his ribs were red blotches. His lips were set in a wide line. His black, ophidian eyes snapped and glowed. His poised right hand flickered like a snake's tongue.

And he was punching, punching as hard as he could, hitting squarely with knuckles and every ounce of weight—careless of the economy of the ring that tells a man to save his hands, for a boxer's hands are a boxer's life, and every hurt sinew, every broken knuckle, every jarred delicate bone counts in the long run. The Italian was hitting, hitting like a trip hammer, hitting for his life.

They faced each other, the Italian poised, drawn like a bowstring, aiming like a sharp-shooter. Irish, jigging on his toes, careless of guarding, feinting with the right hand, breaking ground, feinting with the right again, and then a sudden plunging rush. The jar to his neck as the Italian's straight left caught him flush on the mouth, the whirling crash of infighting, the wrestling clinch. No longer the referee called "Break! Break!" but tore at them with hysterical hands. A tacit understanding grew between to protect at all times, and as they drew apart they hooked and uppercutted, Irish with an insane mood of fighting, the Italian with a quick deliberation: Snap! Snap! the punches.

Patter of feet, and creak of the boards, and little whine of the ropes. The great blue light overhead, the click of the telegraph instruments below. The running feet of the referee and the nervous patting of his hands, clop! clop! The seconds with their eyes glued on the fighting men, and their hands sparring in sympathy. The mooing roar of the crowd and their louder tense silence. And the regular gong, the short respite, hardly a second it seemed, though the interval was a minute—and the gong again.

Once they were so carried away they paid no attention to it, but fought on. Only the referee parted them. Irish held out his glove in apology and they shook hands. The Garden seemed to shake to the cheering.

Whip of lead in the tenth round, crash of counter, deep sock of infighting. Clinch; break. A half second's inattention on the Italian's part, and the left hand of Irish crashed home to the jaw.

Himself did not understand what had happened until he noticed the crumpled figure on the boards and heard the referee:

"Get back, McCann. Get back! . . . One! . . . two . . . ." An immense hysteria of sound filled the house. Men jumped on seats. The telegraph instruments clattered madly. Somewhere near the ring was a fist fight.

"Three!"

The crumpled figure twitched. At four it was dragging itself to its hands. The glazed eyes blinked. Life returned. The Italian shook his head. At seven he was on his hands and knees, his head clearing. At eight he was kneeling on one knee, one glove resting on boards. God! how long the seconds were, Irish thought.

"Nine!" Slowly the Italian rose.

The Garden was no longer filled with human beings but with instruments of baritone sound. It hit the roof, rebounded, whirled, surged. All about Irish was sound. In front of him the Italian weak at the knees. The referee hunched like a bowler. Irish jumped in, fists swinging. His fists met crossed arms, elbows, shoulders, but not jaw or head. And suddenly the Italian was clinging to him, as a terrified cat will cling—he couldn't tear himself loose. It took the referee and him to tear the Italian away.

Insane with the din, blind with excitement, he rushed again to meet the beautidoes not transmit heat. Man's underclothing must similarly be capable of quickly absorbing his perspiration when overheated and allowing it to evaporate at once to dry the skin. Only the fat-free vegetable fibers will do this, for the wool is not only reluctant to take up the moisture, but when soaked it dries off too slowly to be of use. After the period of activity the man is clothed in water-logged garments whose slow drying chills him when he does not need cooling. He is like a cat which has fallen into the water.

"The advantages of cotton underclothing," the writer goes on to say, "are now being appreciated for the first time since wool has been regarded as the proper thing. Tropical experts call attention to the evil effects of wool and strongly advise cotton for its quick absorption and evaporation. In colder climates, wearers of cotton report that it absorbs perspiration, delivers it as vapor at once to the air between the outer and inner garments, keeps the skin dry, and prevents chilling, while the woolen outer garments prevent the escape of body heat and protect from moist cold and fog."

This is all right so far as it goes, but linen mesh is as superior to cotton as cotton is superior to wool.

Land, Food and Population

MRS. MARGARET SANGER, advocate of birth control, predicts a population of 1,000,000,000 in America by 2023, unless the methods she has argued for are adopted. She says the population is increasing faster than the food supply.

This is no new idea. More than a century ago Malthus, whose theory is now generally discredited, taught that it was necessary artificially to repress the increase of the human race, or the race would be in danger of starvation.

Before that happens—at least in America—we shall have to see millions of acres under cultivation in Northern Canada, where the wheat area is being pushed constantly farther north. "Dry farming" will add other millions of acres of productive land in the Southwest. The irrigation of arid lands, and the drainage of swamp lands will contribute more millions of acres, where intensive culture may be practiced. Then we may greatly increase the yield of our crops by proper treatment of the soil. Americans are proverbially reckless and wasteful. The yield of wheat in this country is only about half the yield of European wheat fields, where the owners have treated the soil scientifically. Again, men like Burbank are constantly discovering that we have only begun to scratch upon the edge of the possibilities of Mother Nature, in the way of furnishing plant food.

Malthus made the great mistake of not distinguishing between our present method of devoting the land to the raising of cattle, and a natural diet of fruit, nuts and grain, which many believe to be the natural diet of man, as it is today of the apes, from a branch of which family man is descended. The time will certainly come—indeed it has already arrived—when we can no longer afford to raise range cattle. After that stock cattle will have to go, and then perhaps, in course of thousands of years, the earth may become too populous to raise grain, but even then mankind need not starve.

The figures in the first column of the following table, showing the pounds of food that may be raised per acre of various food products are from Otto Carque's "The Foundation of All Reforms." From these figures I have worked out the second column, showing how many persons may be supported upon one square mile, or 640 acres, in the various food products:

	Pounds per acre.	Pop. per square mile.
Wheat	900	1,860
Corn	1,500	3,025
Legumes & peanuts	1,200	2,397
Potatoes	10,000	6,000
Peaches	10,000	3,500
Apples	25,000	8,727
Walnuts	7,500	11,636
Bananas	120,000	41,890
Range Cattle	80	58

In brief, then, we find this: The average amount of above products, reckoned on a water-free basis, that may be produced on an acre of land, is 2620 pounds, or sufficient for the support of eight persons, provided the food is properly chewed, not bolted. This means that, in good soil, with plenty of water for irrigation, where it is necessary, a family of five people may easily live on the food products that can be raised on an acre of land, after making allowance for the space occupied by a house, barn, outbuildings, lawn and flower garden. These products may be still further increased by utilizing the fence and blank walls for vines and berries. A few chickens may be kept to run about under the fruit trees, provided they are fenced off from the young growing vegetables, but no horse or cow can be kept under this plan, on an acre of land.

Cayenne—Typical Land of Jean Valjean

A French Penal Colony in Which Horrors Worthy of a Victor Hugo's Pen are Said to be Perpetrated.

BY HARRY A. FRANCK

> The following article is published in The Times Illustrated Magazine by courtesy of the Century Company of New York, publishers of Mr. Franck's brilliant trilogy of travel books: "Working North from Patagonia," "Vagabonding Down the Andes" and "A Vagabond Journey Around the World."—Editor.

HARRY A. FRANCK,
Author of "Working North From Patagonia." Published by The Century Co.

IT IS against the law, or at least almost impossible, to visit the "camp," as the big prison in the town of Cayenne is called, particularly since some American got the former commander "in wrong" with the French government by publishing an account of such a visit. But neither laws nor strict rules survive personal friendship in Latin countries, and I had made good use of my short acquaintance with the four Frenchmen who had landed with me. At that, they politely hedged when I hinted a desire to get inside the prison, until one morning, catching alone one of them who had been transferred here from New Caledonia as a guard I mellowed him with strong iced drinks under the earth-floored veranda of Cayenne's least disreputable cafe. So wheedlingly did he introduce me to the stern "principal" of the prison, a French captain, that the cut and dried refusal shriveled on his lips and, taking down a large bunch of big keys, he led us into the prison in person.

It is under strict military regime, the building that forms a part of the wall of the immense yard being the barracks of soldier guards. Here they had good spring beds and paid the nominal sum of one franc twenty-five centimes a day, with an additional two francs for their wives, in the rare cases in which they had brought them out from France. There were separate rooms for one or two families, and a good kitchen well served by convicts, with wine and champagne for those who could afford it. Across the bare yard were many massive, gates with prisoner turnkeys, for discipline is maintained largely by making trusties and "stool-pigeons" and setting them as spies over the rest. There was an infirmerie where the merely sick are shut up in pens, a sad looking place with much fever and crude, careless surgery without anesthetics, from which those who can convince the hard-hearted officials that they are really ill are sent to the hospital. The "principal" was full of courtesies for me, but he took it out on the prisoners, always addressing them as one might a particularly low class of animal. Indeed, officials high and low were incredibly prejudiced against the convicts; not one of them seemed to be large enough to recognize them as partly the victims of society or of circumstances. The officers have a secret identification system, and the prisoners a secret argot, or slang, which keeps guards and guarded still farther apart. There are special and incredible punishments for the slightest offenses, such as failing to grovel before the meanest underling among the soldier guards, which increases the number of invalids. Even in the infirmary there was not a book to be had, nothing whatever to take the minds of inmates off their present deplorable surroundings, not even a sign of a priest.

I have never seen a human institution over the door of which Dante's famous phrase would be more entirely appropriate. The bitter cynicism of the monument of Schoelcher freeing a black slave in the main square of Cayenne is sure to strike one after a visit to the prison.

The bulk of the prison is made up of big dungeons with a few small barred windows high above the unleveled earth floor, in which are confined the regular prisoners divided by "classes,"—Arabs here, men from Madagascar there, white Frenchmen in others. This division is no concession to the color-line, but is merely for the purpose of simplifying the administration. Three feet above the ground were four parallel poles, and fastened to these were strips of stiff canvas two feet wide and a little more than five long, all so close together that even a thin man could barely squeeze between them, forming two rows of sleeping quarters the length of each dungeon. Evidently nothing else was allowed, for one fellow with a fever being covered with a dirty old rag the "principal" demanded of the trembling trusty in charge, in a voice such as one might use to a street cur, at the same time snatching the cover off the invalid, "Where did he get that?" The trusty shakingly replied that it was an old flour sack, which he was forthwith ordered to turn over to the guard outside. "Do you dare not rise and take off your hat when you see me pass?" bellowed the commander to another emaciated wretch who with the greatest difficulty could crawl to his feet and force his legs to hold him, though he hastened to do both. Even this was not enough for my wine-cheered friend from the boat, who proceeded to shout more insults at the fellow for his "insubordination."

Convicts working in the steaming jungles. Illustrated from "Working North From Patagonia." (Century Company.)

In another room were a few trinkets, odds and ends and covers of various origins for some of the canvas-strip beds. The "principal" explained that this was the room of trusties and turnkeys, several of whom were then standing at attention before him. Then, still pretending to give me information, but raising his voice to a bellow, he screamed, "Yes, these we allow a few extra privileges, and they are even greater pigs than the others—Oui, ils sont les plus cochons de tous!"

Five Years to "Life," Without a Bath

THERE was not much visible sign of an opportunity to be anything else. I saw not only no bath anywhere within the "camp" but no place where a prisoner could so much as wash his hands. Nothing but absolute brute necessities were recognized, and even then everything was of the crudest and coarsest.

"And do you treat educated men and those who have formerly lived in clean surroundings the same as you do the recidivists and the apaches?" I asked.

"Bah!" cried the captain, with his nastiest sneer, through maintaining his attitude of overdrawn courtesy toward me. "After a few days they become just like the others and you never see the slightest difference."

Come to think it over, I suppose they would.

The prisoners get up at 5 o'clock, have coffee, and go to work at 6:30. A "breakfast" of thin soup, one vegetable, half a kilo of bread de deuxieme qualite, and what is supposed to be 250 grams of meat before it is cooked, but which boils down to about half that, is served at 10:30. Three hours later the famished convicts are marched out into the blazing sunshine again to complete their eight hours of daily toil. At night they get a slab of bread and a kind of vegetable hash, duly weighed on dirty scales. It is impossible that any grown man doing manual labor should not be habitually ravenous on such a diet. Not only was the stuff of the coarsest grade imaginable, and unsavory as food carelessly cooked in great bulk always is, but it was handled by guards, visitors, and any other chance passer-by exactly as one might handle the food of a dog, perhaps dropped underfoot and then tossed back into the pan, from which it might be doled out to a man who a year or two before ate in the best restaurants of Paris.

Here We Have a "Les Miserables" of Today

AN OLD chapel, now full of cells, was a place of punishment for minor infractions of the rules, the inmates of which slept on boards and were given bread and water two days out of three. In another building were the cachots, or dungeons proper, stone rooms about four by six feet in size, with very low ceilings, solid doors, and only a hole some ten inches in diameter for ventilation. Here recaptured men awaiting trial were kept in solitary confinement, with a plank for bed, worn concave during many years of occupation, a block of wood as pillow, and bread and water one day out of three. For those who aroused still greater wrath among their guards there were cells in which a man could neither stand up nor lie down, and other underground horrors worthy of the Inquisition. I am not one of those who believe in making prison life a perpetual ball-game; but there are limits to the brutality which man should permit himself toward his fellowmen. After all, it did not look as if Hugo's famous novel had done much to mitigate the lot of French prisoners. Things may have been alleviated in France itself, but in this tropical Hades there has certainly been no improvement over the bagnes of Toulon of a century ago.

"Look at that dog!" cried the commander, as the occupant of one of these ovens rose to his feet when we entered. Then, with all the sarcasm he could throw into his voice, "Vous etes content, hien?" The officials all seemed to try to impress me with the fact that they had a particularly dangerous and incorrigible lot of wild animals in their charge, and looked for applause at their ability to keep them under control by such methods as savage brutality and by taking every advantage of the helpless wretches to taunt them. Yet no owner of wild animals would have dreamed of keeping them in such airless, crowded and starved conditions. There was a den of relegues, for instance, ex-convicts who had violated their parole as liberes and were awaiting trial—nearly all white Frenchmen and as fine a collection of hopeless, helpless, careless, don't give-a-damn toughs as it has ever been my privilege to see.

Atmosphere That of a Den of Wild Beasts

THE atmosphere was exactly that of a den of savage beasts who considered all the outside world their implacable enemies and were ready to rend and tear anyone who was so careless as to come within reach without a weapon with which to cow them. There were between thirty and forty in each of the 12 by 16 rooms, and by no means space on the two wooden platforms, resembling those in the aisles de nuit in French cities, for all to lie down at once.

To add to the joy of their lot, the prisoners are constantly robbed of their legal rations to fill the pockets of the officials and guards. There is a saying that officers arrive in Cayenne with half a trunk and leave with six. In theory, the men are entitled to wine, tobacco, and reading matter; practically, they never see any of those things unless they manage to get them from outside. At Albina, across from the chief penal station on the Dutch boundary, wine is always for sale at a song. The Indians or "Boschs" who bring in an escaped prisoner get two of the $5 paid by the French government, the prison officials pocketing the rest. There is always an advantage in killing off prisoners, for their names are still kept on the books and the officials still these devices there is a potential danger, and that they are not safe, as too many people think, simply because they are well connected with the source of gas supply, and no gas comes out of them except when it is burning.

"The burning itself produces other gases that are fatal to life if breathed in quantities at all large, and the quantities soon become large in any room not well ventilated. Bathrooms, in cold weather, are apt to be tightly closed, and therefore none of the gas-burning devices should be used in them without intelligent precautions frequently to renew the air and to permit the escape of the carbon oxides.

"Gas-heaters should be connected with a chimney, if possible, and the best and safest of all positions for them is well within a real fireplace.

"The smaller ones, if in a big room, with windows and doors not too well sealed, are not likely to do immediately serious harm in any case, but even then there is risk to health."

Restlessness

FOLLOWING is from an address by Dr. Thomas Baker, secretary and acting president of the Carnegie Institute of Technology, Pittsburg:

"We often mistake restlessness for energy. We may be making a great display of energy on enterprises that have no permanent value. The rapid increase of interest in sports and recreation is a natural corrollary to the heightened feverishness of our age. If we believe that the convocation of man's energy depends on high thinking, we should attach more importance to repose and contemplation than we do at present.

"Popular education can increase the sum total of human energy by bringing to the surface powers that otherwise would have remained latent. It can liberate the mind of superior endowments."

Wise Old Hippocrates

OVER two thousand years ago, Hippocrates said some things on the subject of health and disease that have not been said any better since his time. For instance, here are some of his rules regarding diet—all of them good, all of them sane, and all of them being accepted today:

"It is a matter of greatest importance to a man's health whether his common bread is white or brown, whether it is well or ill baked.

"It is very injurious to health to eat more than the system needs, if at the same time he uses no exercise to carry off the excess.

"A large variety of different foods should not be eaten at one time, as it will make a disturbance and create a flatulence of the bowels.

"When one has missed his dinner he ought not to eat a plentiful supper to make up for the loss, for it will lie heavy on his stomach and he will have a more restless night after it.

"Old people require only a small amount of nourishment. Too large a quantity would extinguish the little life force they have left.

"When the body is filled with impurities and the blood is loaded with waste products, the more you nourish it the more you hurt it.

"Milk is harmful for those who are feverish or afflicted with headache."

Underclothing

THAT wool is a filthy and unsanitary material for underclothing has frequently been stated in these columns. Like other statements made here during the past twenty years it has incited criticism and objections from many. However, investigators are gradually coming around to admit the truth of this, as of other statements regarding the care of the body made here from time to time.

That woolen underclothing is a "disappearing fad" is asserted by an editorial writer in American Medicine. The growing appreciation of cotton fabrics for wear close to the skin is, he says, "another of those curious reversals of professional opinion which have been the history of medicine and hygiene." He goes on:

"Man has always used an absorbent vegetable fiber next to his skin, except in very cold climates where he had neither cotton nor flannel and depended upon the skins of wild animals. Two or three generations [illegible] to reverse the habits of mankind, [illegible] dogma went forth that health was impossible without woolen undergarments summer and winter. The expense being prohibitive, all kinds of alleged near-wool fabrics were devised, some of which contained so little wool as to be practically cotton. Then, to avoid the well-known skin irritation due to coarse woolen fibers, or even thick hairs, other ingenious inventors devised special fabrics whose high cost made them the fad of the rich—probably because they were expensive. Some went even a step further and spent small fortunes on silk, under the impression that the higher the cost the greater the efficiency. At the present time there are as many 'expert' opinions on the proper material as there are materials, and of course the arguments are mutually destructive.

"Animals clothed in wool do not perspire, and that is the point to remember in deciding upon the uses of underclothing. The woolen coats of the lower animals, besides their protection from cold, are apparently evolved to prevent external moisture from reaching the skin, which is dry, even if the animal is immersed in water. Our outer garments in winter or damp weather, therefore, should be of wool to protect from external moisture. All fur-bearing animals in lieu of perspiration have special arrangements for cooling off when overheated, but all those which, like man, depend upon the evaporation of perspiration are so built that the hair lies flat and the moisture evaporates at once, but when chilling takes place, the erector pili muscles arrange the hair on end, constituting a thick coat which

This gentleman's age is 70 years; occupation—Secretary and Accountant. His physician's report shows that prior to taking the Witter Water Treatment "The arteries were not as elastic as they should be, but would not say they were hardened." Last report from physician, dated Aug. 15th, shows "Marked improvement in elasticity of arteries; also, general condition wonderfully improved."

These reports show a good reason for the enthusiasm which this patient has for Witter Water. It also explains why his physician is now using the Witter Water with other patients who are troubled with high blood pressure.

When the doctor put this 70-year-old patient on the Witter Water, he did it because all other treatments had failed to bring a permanently lowered blood pressure and was, therefore, willing to experiment in the use of Witter Water. Now he knows that Witter Water does reduce blood pressure, and is willing to prescribe the Witter Water Treatment.

Symptoms of Blood Pressure:

1. Cold hands and Cold feet.
2. Slight momentary dizziness.

7. Constipation.
8. Weakness and lowered vitality.

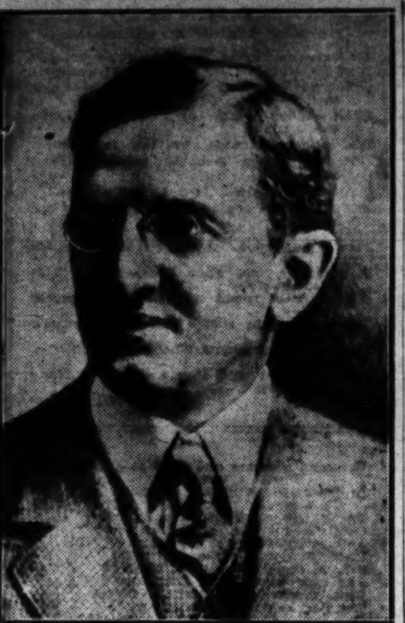
People We Meet in "Little Old New York"

BY BEN FIELD



William Griffith

MAGAZINES may have hearts as well as men. Some of them, however, are just intellectual, showing but little of the personal touch or of emotion and human sympathy.

I am writing of a magazine with a heart and of an editor who is not only Byronic in appearance but great-hearted, as was Byron.

It is he who puts the heart, the personal, human equation into the magazine.

He lives in Greenwich Village and that, to be sure, is an evidence of heart. I had the good fortune to be his bachelor companion for two months this summer while hearing lectures at Columbia University. He is a national character. And when an editor is a national character and a poet as well, there are things about him which intrigue our interest.

Witter Bynner and David Morton and this editor were dining, casually, at Keen's Chop House, formerly The Lamb's Club. I don't know how many silver hips were present, perhaps none; but I suspect there were one or two. You know there is a make of tobacco that is put in a curved tin to conform, in the hip pocket, to the human form, not divine, but male. Well, the idea has included liquids, back in little old New York, and it has spread rapidly as far west as Catalina Island and Honolulu.

When Mentioning Poets, Why Drag in Keats?

LATE in the evening, on the occasion referred to, Mr. Morton said: "Bill, do you know, among all the poets I have ever met, or read, up to the present moment, three stand out in my mind as having the most poetic attitude toward the hurly-burly of life."

"Who are they?" asked Bill.

"Yes, sir, three, no more, only three, John Keats, Witter Bynner and Bill Griffith!"

And then William Griffith perpetrated his famous query: "Good Lord, why drag in Keats?"

I said I lived with the editor, William Griffith; but more properly speaking we lived at the apartment of White Hope—the cat, and Mr. Griffith and I were incidental thereto. White Hope has blue, disconcerting eyes and long white hair. which she swallows (the hair I mean,) and periodically disgorges it at inopportune moments. She belongs to Mrs. Griffith who travels, in the summer time, to distant lands. White Hope runs the apartment and doors stand open and servants stand aside to suit her whim.

On mild, clear mornings she is lowered, by means of a natty harness and long silk ribbon, to a six-by-eight backyard where she is supposed to take the sun and absorb the magnetic radiations from mother earth. Being a New York-apartment cat she immediately saunters to the shade and sits on a concrete block. William Griffith was accustomed, lovingly, to perform these ministrations, with certain quasifeminine croonings of affection, all out of place in a bachelor apartment.

But later, being left alone for a period, it was my place to pull White Hope off of her block and induce her to sit on the ground, the while I banged out old Greek gods and things on the antiquated family typewriter.

Do you know, if Lord Byron had owned a typewriter like that one at No. 27 West 10th street, he might have edged in on the Morton triumvirate of poets. As it was we used to have the plumber in to get the ribbon going again when it reached an end and refused to wind back the other way.

Moisture Plentiful in New York Last Summer

I NEVER really blamed White Hope for sitting on a concrete block. I would do it myself, or stand up! There wasn't a place in all the Atlantic States, last summer, where you could sit on the ground without getting your pants wet. Of course White Hope didn't have pants, she wore—no she didn't either. But it rained that way so much that crowds of young girls in silk stockings and low shoes would be huddled in the subways, like scared rabbits. And I don't know what happened out in the country.

The Italian-French Pierrot was essentially an immoral creation, not from Pierrot's or Pierrette's standpoint, but from our standpoint on this side of the Atlantic. Yet William Griffith has immortalized these delightful characters in his "Loves and Losses of Pierrot," recreated a Pierrot and a Pierrette, a Columbine and a Yvonie as pure as snow.

The book will be republished this winter, and it is to be translated into French. Literary Paris has found something enthralling in the new and purer Pierrot.

Also there will be new editions of Mr. Griffith's "Candles in the Sun" and "City Pastorals and Other Poems."

I asked David Morton: "Are we doing as fine poetic work here in the United States as the poets of England?"

He answered: "Yes, but we have no John Masefield."

And I thought of this many times as I sat in a basement cafe at a Sixth-avenue corner in the Village, a cafe whose smoke-browned walls are autographed with the verses of famous writers and enlivened with pictures and sketches by the hands of well-known painters and artists.

Lunched at Cafe Where Masefield Tended Bar

"IS IT true," I questioned the proprietor, "that John Masefield tended bar in this room?"

"It certainly is," he replied, "and a fine husky he was! Later on he worked in a carpet factory on the Hudson."

"Yes," mused the editor, "and someone, whose name I will not mention, gave him a book of Chaucer. And Masefield exclaimed, 'If this is great writing, I can write myself.'"

And the world knows that the author of "The Everlasting Mercy," "The Widow in the By Street," "The Tragedy of Nan" and "The Old Front Line" did write.

"Many people like his sustained poem, 'Right Royal,'" I remarked.

"Yes," grudgingly replied the proprietor, (who was a college graduate and versed in six languages,) "but most of his other work is stronger and more typical of the Masefield the world admires and by whom it is a little mystified."

Some of the Gotham editors and publishers have a quite-sufficient amount of self-esteem. There is the story, for example, of Frank Harris, at one time editor of Pearson's Magazine. About to take a trip to the Rivera, he announced in his publication that the greatest writer of America was leaving its shores. He also stated that his own story, "Mendoza Matador," was the greatest short story in the English language.

And, at that, he was not so far wrong. Perhaps the spirit of Edgar Allen Poe and the spirit of O. Henry and the living Charles F. Lummis are about all who could take exception.

Speaking of O. Henry, I like to recall that the managing editor of Current Opinion has rendered high tribute to his dead but immortal friend. For William Griffith and O. Henry were friends. They used to live together on Washington Square, in the old days when the magazine and publishing houses were down on Union Square. And often Editor Griffith would make an advance payment on a story that was not yet even sketched, and often O. Henry would pocket his fee and, for a time, forget all about the story. It was so that "A Municipal Report" was written, perhaps O. Henry's greatest effort. Who could know that it was worth $10,000 probably, instead of the nominal sum for which the temperamental author sold it to the then-editor of Hampton's Magazine, William Griffith? But O. Henry has gone, except from the hearts of the readers of the world, where he will remain enshrined forever.

Editor Sells O. Henry Letters For Benefit of Red Cross

DURING the war, Mr. Griffith sold several of O. Henry's letters to him for $1800 and bought Liberty Bonds with the proceeds and gave them to the Red Cross. These letters are reproduced and the whole matter is set out in a report by the American Museum and Art Gallery in New York. This is of interest at this time when other of O. Henry's letters are about to be given to the world.

I quote one of the O. Henry letters to Mr. Griffith. In it the great short-story writer discusses something of his literary methods, such as, for instance, the leaving of a title until the story was written. The letter reads:

"O. Henry
28 W. 26
N. Y.

Title will follow with the remainder—have to take time on titles.

My Dear Colonel: (William Griffith, editor of Hampton's Magazine, in which appeared many of O. Henry's best stories,)

The story—(you will please understand that this scenario does not give the effect) ends as follows:

The old negro carriage driver is a relic of the old South. He is a night hawk and a ruffian (presumably) but his piratical depredations upon travelers and transients are for the sole purpose of supporting an elderly lady (the poetess) who is the last of the family to which he once belonged. All his small earnings are contributed to that end.

Major Caswell, a type of the degraded Southerner, is living off the slender income of his relative (Azalea, Adair.) He is the rat and utterly despicable.

Azalea Adair is a type of the tenderly nurtured lady of the old regime, but who is drained of her resources (furnished principally by the old negro) by her impossible relative.

In the end there is a dramatic and mysterious murder, the victim being Major Caswell. The 'snapper' comes in the last paragraph, revealing the slayer by a bare intimation. The whole scheme is to show that an absolutely prosaic and conventional town (such as Nashville) can equal San Francisco, Bagdad or Paris when it comes to a human story.

The beginning of the story is not yet written—there will be two or three pages (to follow) containing references to Frank Norris's lines in which the words occur—'Think of anything happening in Nashville, Tennessee.' I have to look this up in Putnam's Magazine.

It will work out all right.

P.S. 'Your money back if you want it.'

P.P.S. Send the dough to the Caledonia. I'll wait here for it. And send it soon.

There's just enough space here to send you my personal regards."

The P.P.S. referred to an advance payment of $50 on the sum of $250 paid for the serial rights to this masterpiece, revealing O. Henry's chronic need of money, and it was almost impossible for an editor to get a story from him without paying something in advance.

It will be recognized, of course, that the above letter has to do with O. Henry's "A Municipal Report."

Old Barstow Mansion, Relic Of Colonial Days

A VISIT, interesting from an historical and literary standpoint, was to the Barstow Mansion, near Pelham, one of the oldest buildings in suburban New York. It was built by the English and is one of the four manors of colonial days.

You imagine yourself on some great English estate. Here the Poetry Society of America held its final gathering at the end of May. The International Garden Club later leased the property and literary people were entertained by Leonora Speyer and Mrs. Harriet Williams and Mrs. Edward R. Howett, the latter president of the Garden Club. Not a few writers read from their own poems. Anna Catherine Markham, secretary of the Poetry Society, presided. Edwin Markham, honorary president, was away that day in Washington, reading his great poem on Lincoln at the behest of the President of the United States. And thus our dean of American poetry helped to dedicate the Lincoln Memorial.

Speaking of poetry and shrines, historical and literary, I'am reminded that the greatness of genius still rests upon Chelsea. Elbert Hubbard tells us in his Little Journeys that certain gods of art once lived and loved and worked and died there. Sir Thomas Moore, Erasmus, and Hans Sloane who really started the British Museum, Bishop Atterbury, Dean Swift and Dr. Arbuthnot, Richard Steele and George Eliot and William Turner—all these helped to make of Chelsea a world shrine.

And over on Staten Island, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Markham, is such another shrine. You travel far to reach their rose garden and experience their welcome, but what a welcome it is! Edwin Markham, with leonine head and flashing eyes, and Anna Catharine Markham whose sweet graciousness wins all hearts.

You may find Hamlin Garland and Leonora Speyer there perhaps. And Marguerite Wilkinson and Clara Platt Meadowcroft, or maybe one of the Benets or Guiterman or Jessie Rittenhouse. They come and go and, if you are fortunate, you may meet Witter Bynner, William Griffith or Clinton Scollard or Edwin Arlington Robinson or Bliss Carmen.

Ancient Structure of King George's Days at Columbia

AND on the campus of Columbia University at Morningside Heights stands another building and shrine. It too was erected by the British. Now it is the principal one of the many Columbia University libraries, a part of this great institution of learning; but it was built in the reign of King George and for many years was an English college building.

Here were assembled over 12,500 summer students this year for their studies and lectures. They came from all parts of the United States and from nearly every foreign land. Many from other countries wore their native costumes, making of the campus a delightful conglomerate picture. Los Angeles and Southern California were well represented and here I attended lectures under Prof. John Erskine.

It is worth while to travel 6000 or 7000 miles for a few weeks' course in one of the greatest universities in the world, to get the Columbia atmosphere and receive a big blue certificate with the seal of Columbia on it, and so many units of credit! I am sure it is worth while, even though western universities offer gratifying advantages.

Tributes Paid to a Coterie Of Brilliant Editors

JOHN ERSKINE has taken office as the new president of the Poetry Society of America and Leonore Speyer the new vice-president, with Edwin Markham continued as honorary president. At the October meeting many beautiful memorial tributes were paid to the memory of the late Dr. E. J. Wheeler, who for twenty years was editor of Current Opinion and for ten years president of the Poetry Society of America. Hamlin Garland, Ralph Waldo Trine, May Riley Smith and others spoke in this vein.

Here was an editor loved by the people and respected by his contemporaries. I can think of but few public men who have been so held in esteem. Gen. Harrison Grey Otis, indeed, was such a man, as was Horace Greeley and Henry Watterson.

It was Dr. E. J. Wheeler who started the movement for Poetry Society bells in honor of fallen soldiers, to be placed in the devastated cities of France.

The bell in honor of Joyce Kilmer has been placed at Crecy au Mont, near the Aisne, and the one in honor of Alan Seeger at Landricourt.

Now the Verse Writers' Club of Southern California is about to donate a bell, through the Poetry Society of New York, in honor of some dead soldier of the United States Army.

Another interesting landmark is the

CARE OF THE BODY

CONDUCTED BY
HARRY ELLINGTON BROOK, N. D.

The Abrams Business

THERE seems to be an epidemic of "wonderful cures," just now. The large profits gathered from this sort of thing induce many enterprising physicians to make hay while the sun shines—or rather, while the clouds of credulity and ignorance prevail.

When a staid and "ethical" publication like the Journal of the American Medical Association publishes a twelve page supplement on the Abrams diagnosis and treatment, it shows that "something is doing," in medical circles. It pains me to have to agree with the Journal, but in this case I cannot avoid doing so, although I suspect that its motives are attributable rather to fear of competition than to love of humanity. Many reputable members of the A.M.A. have been demanding permission to advertise so as to compete with enterprising outsiders.

About twelve years ago, Dr. Albert Abrams of San Francisco published a book, explaining his new method of "spondylotherapy." I reviewed it in these columns. The method was a deep manual massage of the abdominal regions, something akin to osteopathy, and had some good points.

Abrams' latest "discovery" is far more ambitious. From a drop of dried blood, he professes to be able to tell the sex, paternity, race and physical condition of the subject, who may be thousands of miles away. This opens up a grand vista of a mail order business. Yet more wonderful, he claims that you may send, instead of a drop of blood, the autograph of a person, living or dead, and he will tell you what is—or was—the matter with him. Yet further, Dr. Abrams claims that he can determine the religion of the individual by his "electronic reactions."

As it would be a physical impossibility for Dr. Abrams to give personal investigation to all the drops of dried blood and autographs that he is receiving, from all parts of the world, he probably turns most of them over to a corps of more or less skilled and careful assistants.

The field of treatment is also revolutionary. Dr. Abrams has a secret machine, called the "oscillaclast," that he alone can make. This is sealed and rented to physicians, who must sign a contract that they will not open it. It promises those who rent this machine incomes of from $1000 to $2000 a week, and it is astonishing how many reputable physicians, all over the country, have succumbed to the lure.

The applicant must first take a short course of instruction, which costs $250. Then he pays $200 or $250, as a deposit, and signs a contract that the box will not be opened. After that, he pays a rental of $5 a month.

Of course, Abrams guesses right, sometimes. He couldn't well help doing so. And there are plenty of testimonials. There never was a "remedy" placed on the market, however absurd, that did not yield thousands of testimonials, many of them genuine, for suggestion plays a large part in such "cures."

Within a year, this "wonderful discovery" will be forgotten and replaced by something equally wonderful—and profitable.

If this treatment does no good, it is at least not directly harmful, as are many of the "wonderful cures" offered to a gullible public. The harm it does is indirect, in arousing false hopes, and leading sick people to postpone—perhaps until too late—the only possible cure—to cease doing that which makes them sick.

Of course, there are already imitations, that are not only "just as good," but, in the opinion of the inventors, even better. Abrams recently brought suit for $25,000 damages, against two Los Angeles men, for copying his machine. The defendants declare that their machine is an improvement.

Before long, "oscilloclasts" may be as common as radio sets.

I am told that in Los Angeles alone more than twenty-five osteopaths have installed the machine, and several "ethical" M.D.'s are using it, under camouflage.

I suppose some of these physicians really believe in this strange device. At least, I hope so.

Osteopathy

FOLLOWING, from the Western Osteopath, is by Dr. Dain L. Tasker, one of the leading osteopaths of California:

"Heretofore we have won and lost various tactical legal battles against organized medicine in California. Finally, organized medicine succeeded in driving us to use our last line of defense, the initiative. We have been forced to accept many compromises in the Legislature. In the last session of the Legislature our offer to make further compromise was arrogantly rejected by organized medicine, thus leaving us no opportunity to continue living without relief by court action or initiative legislation.

"We have now secured the necessary conditions for the preservation of our profession in this State, through three court actions and successful initiative legislation. This success comes to us just as we have reached twenty-one years of legal recognition in California. We have reached our majority, the beginning of the period of full personal responsibility for what we do.

"Organized medicine has been entrenched in civilized society since such a society existed. Many thousands of M.D.'s are licensed in this State and the control of every State, county and city hospital and health agency is in their hands. Nearly every voter was met at the threshold of extra-uterine life by the hands of an M.D. and at various times in life received professional advice and care from such exponents of organized medicine, yet when it came to a show-down these voters indicated a lack of confidence in organized medicine. There can be no better evidence of the popular disrepute of organized medicine than this huge majority in favor of our initiative. A well-merited rebuke has been registered by the electorate against the notorious abuses exercised by the medical profession not necessarily as individual physicians, but as an organized band exhibiting the 'courage of the pack.'

"We are now charged with the great responsibility of administering the same law which an M.D.-dominated board has heretofore administered to our detriment."

Satire

IN "LORNA DOONE," John Ridd says:

"It strikes me that, of all human dealings, satire is the very lowest, and most mean and common. It is the equivalent in words for what bullying is in deeds; and no more bespeaks a clever man than the other does a brave one. These two wretched tricks exalt a fool in his own low esteem, but never in his neighbor's; for the deep common sense of our nature tells that no man of a genial heart, or of any spread of mind, can take pride in either. And though a good man may commit the one fault or the other, now and then by way of outlet, he is sure to have compunctions soon, and to scorn himself more than the sufferer."

This is true, as regards satire, directed against individuals, to gratify personal animosity. When used for a proper purpose—to combat social evils, for instance, or bad men in public office—satire is a legitimate and effective weapon.

When I edited the Wasp, in San Francisco, more than forty years ago, we had a standing line on the editorial page, reading, "Satire is More Powerful than Abuse."

Children and War

FOLLOWING circular has been issued by Palo Alto (Cal.) branch of the Woman's International League for Peace and Freedom:

"Toy pistols, soldiers and guns teach children to tolerate and admire war, and to anticipate killing people in war.

"Military clothes for children teach admiration for soldiers' professional clothes. Military uniforms are planned to be decorative, so as to impress people. Their miniature imitations impress the young as well as the old. Girls and boys are even taught the stiff, ungraceful gesture of the military salute.

"Toy submarines, battleships, airships with bomb-dropping apparatus and armored automobiles are made and sold.

"War is not a pleasant game! War is hideous. There cannot be 'civilized warfare.' Vast majorities in all countries condemn war. Teaching children that war is a pleasant game is a great mental danger.

"The place to begin is in the nursery. Disarm the nursery first. Children's minds are extraordinarily receptive. Impressions are lasting.

"Banish all war toys, war clothes, war pictures and war story books.

"No store would put into stock a toy guillotine, or a headsman's ax and block, with puppets to be beheaded. Parents would revolt at the idea of their children playing games with such toys of violence and death. If they would think, they would revolt at the idea of all kinds of war toys and war clothes. Sham battles are both silly and wicked. Uniforms are made to be soaked in gore.

"The Woman's International League for Peace and Freedom at its convention in 1921, a congress of mothers from thirty-eight countries, condemned war toys and appealed to all the mothers of all countries to disarm the nursery.

"This brief statement is circulated to emphasize the international advice, and to name specifically pistols, guns, soldiers, cannon, submarines, battleships, armored automobiles, armed airships, war pictures and war story books."

To some, this may seem like a small thing, but it is not. Lasting impressions are formed in the nursery.

Teach boys to be manly and honest and kind, and to be considerate to all living things.

That is the only way in which this poor old world may be redeemed.

Gas Heaters

A FEW weeks ago, a man and wife were found dead in Los Angeles. They were killed by the fumes arising from a gas heater. Such happenings are not uncommon.

Gas heaters are unhealthful, when no provision is made for the escape of gas, by means of a chimney, or stovepipe. They poison the air.

Attention is called by the New York Times to the case of a young husband and wife who were asphyxiated recently in Yonkers, N. Y. Their deaths at first looked like a mysterious murder, for they showed no signs of violence and their apartment had not been robbed. Investigation disclosed that they were victims of the products of combustion, a gas-range and a gas-heater having been found still burning when the neighbors broke into the flat. Says the Times:

"Both of these popular conveniences were in good order, and there had been no escape of gas in the ordinary and familiar sense of that phrase. In reality, of course, there had been an escape in great volume of a gas quite as dangerous as is illuminating gas in its unconsumed state, and this peril is not understood, or at any rate is ignored, by many people, including no small fraction of the multitudes who have now resorted to gasheaters in their several forms.

"Important improvements have been made in recent years on the old-fashioned "gas-log"—improvements in efficiency and in appearance—and as coal-savers they are to be commended warmly. It should not be forgotten, however, as the unfortunate Cohens did—if they ever knew—that in all

Rupert Brooke—Author of "The Sodier"

BY BELLE COOPER

RUPERT BROOKE

A PORTRAIT

A mass of wavy hair all browny-gold,
Crowning a figure tall and firmly made;
A ruddy cheek with coat of tan o'erlaid;
Eyes like blue china, steady, fearless, bold,
Inviting converse; lips that ne'er withhold
A flow of wit, and glowing praises paid
Where Beauty dwells; a spirit unafraid
Of Life—buoyant, chivalric and high-souled.

Garbed in white flannel suit; a shirt of blue;
A tie cerulean, worn in artist guise;
His barefoot feet encased in tennis shoes—
Such was the athlete that Grantchester knew.
Silent he sleeps beneath Aegean skies,
Mourned by Cantabrians who court the Muse.

BELLE COOPER.

THERE visited California in 1913, when he was en route to the islands of the South Seas, a young Englishman who has since attained a world-wide fame. Rupert Brooke was a Cambridge student, athlete and poet, a handsome fair-haired Apollo who looked on life buoyantly, but was destined to close his career in the great war ere he had reached the age of 30.

Many Californians have pleasant memories of him. One Berkeley friend, who chooses to remain anonymous, published an enthusiastic poetic tribute in the Nation when the news came of the poet's death in the Aegean Sea. A premonition of his fate seems to have come to Rupert Brooke when he donned the khaki; for he composed a remarkable sonnet which is as familiarly linked with the life-story of the author as are Alan Seeger's "I have a Rendezvous With Death" and John McCrea's "In Flanders Fields"—two other unforgettable lyrics of the war. Here are Brooke's lines, which were quoted by Dean Inge from the pulpit of St. Paul's a few weeks before the author died:

THE SOLDIER

If I should die, think only this of me:
That there's some corner of a foreign field
That is forever England. There shall be
In that rich earth a richer dust concealed;
A dust whom England bore, shaped, made aware,
Gave, once, her flowers to love, her ways to roam,
A body of England's, breathing English air,
Washed by the rivers, blest by suns of home.

And think, this heart, all evil shed away,
A pulse in the eternal mind, no less
Gives somewhere back the thoughts by England give
Her sights and sounds; dreams happy as her day;
And laughter, learnt of friends; and gentleness,
In hearts at peace, under an English heaven.

And now for the life-story of this young poet-patriot. Rupert Chawner Brooke was the second son of William Parker Brooke, a Rugby master, and the grandson of Canon Brooke of Bath. His mother was Mary Ruth Cotterill, whose brother, Clement C. Cotterill, was the author of "Human Justice for Those at the Bottom" and other books on sociological subjects. The Brooke family consisted of three sons—Dock, six years older than Rupert, who was born on August 3, 1887, and Alfred, three years younger.

Entered Rugby at the Age of Fourteen

RUPERT was a boy of 5 when his father, who had himself been educated at Rugby, became Housemaster of School Field, a position which he retained until his death in 1910. After attending the preparatory school at Hillbrow, Rupert entered Rugby at the age of 14, and the next year won a scholarship. He was very happy in his Rugby schooldays with his 500 student associates; every hour there, he says, was golden and radiant. He was a shy, quiet boy, but he took a keen interest in sports and gained colors in cricket and football. In his last year at Rugby, Rupert became head of the House, a coveted honor among the sixth-form boys. He contributed numerous poems to the Phoenix and the Venture, the school publications. In 1904 he gained an extra prize for a poem on "The Pyramids," and in the following year he won the distinctive school English Verse prize for a poem on "The Bastile." This poem he recited publicly on St. John's Day, 1905, and received the prize—two books, the poems of Robert Browning and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. The next year he won the King's Medal for Prose with an essay on a historical theme.

Just after he had passed his nineteenth birthday he went up to Cambridge and entered King's, his father's college. His name and upbringing gave the young man considerable prestige at this conservative university, especially when coupled with the fact that his uncle, the Rev. Alan England Brooke—now Canon Brooke of Ely—a writer of note on theological subjects, had been for more than a decade Dean and Ely Professor of Divinity at King's College.

In those days Rupert Brooke had a predilection for the literature of the nineties—the decadent literature of the "Yellow Book" period. He read and imitated Walter Pater, Oscar Wilde and Ernest Dowson; he hung Aubrey Beardsleys in his college room; he wore his hair long, his ties were soft and bright, and he sat up late and lay abed in the mornings. As one of his elegists writes:

"In him youth's heady and sweet wine was ripe."

Rupert Brooke, the English Poet

He evinced, however, a healthy interest in dramatics, and joined the college dramatic club known as the A.D.C. The most successful part he played was that of the Herald in "Eumenides," given in the Cambridge Theater. His colleagues recall vividly his radiant, youthful figure in gold and vivid red and blue standing out in the middle of the stage, trumpet in hand, like a page in the Riccardi Chapel.

At the beginning of the next term his elder brother Dick died suddenly, and Rupert experienced his first great sorrow. He tried to drown it by reviewing, as he says, "great slabs of minor poetry for the 'Cambridge Review!'" His first "long vacation" was spent at Lulworth, a charming seacoast resort near Wareham in Dorsetshire. Lulworth is of special interest to lovers of Keats, for it was there on the English Channel that the ship on which John Keats and Joseph Severn had taken passage for Italy was becalmed for a fortnight. One memorable day the two men swam ashore and clambered about the picturesque coast—Keats's last day in England. That night he wrote his last sonnet—a farewell to England, Fannie Brawne and life itself, as it proved—containing the inimitable lines on the sea:

"The moving waters at their priestlike task
Of pure ablution round earth's human shore."

Rupert did not know till four years later of Keats's association with the spot, and yet he had a remarkable experience. This is related in a letter to his mother:

"One day we were reading on the rocks, and I had a Keats in my pocket, and it slipped out, and, falling into a swift current, was borne out to sea. So we leapt into a boat and rowed up and down the coast till we espied it off some rocks. But the sea was rather rough and we could not land on that rocky part, or get near Keats. So we landed half a mile off on a beach, and came over the rocks to the Keats; and when we found it, I stripped and went in after it and got it. It was indeed quite spoilt; but it only cost two shillings to begin with."

Like All Young Poets His Sympathies Were With the Liberals

AT CAMBRIDGE Rupert Brooke belonged to various societies, political, intellectual and revolutionary. He was keenly interested in the University Fabian Society, and served as its secretary and president in turn. Other organizations to which he belonged were the old famous secret Brotherhood, formerly associated with Tennyson and other illustrious members; the Carbonari, a friendly organization which he founded, and the Heretics. He also contributed poems and reviews to the college publications, The Gownsman and The Cambridge Review. In his second college year Rupert took the part of Mephistopheles in "Faustus," and the Attendant Spirit in "Comus"—a part, it will be remembered, originally played by the great musician Henry Lawes himself in the first performance of the masque at Ludlow Castle in Shropshire.

In the summer of 1909 he took the university examination known as the Classical Tripos, and got a second. Most of the rest of the year he passed at a house called "The Orchard" in the hamlet of Grantchester, within easy walking distance of Cambridge. The summer holidays were spent in a vicarage his parents had taken at Clevedon in Somerset, and to which he invited relays of his Cambridge friends. Meanwhile he was working for the Charles Oldham Shakespeare prize—worth £74—which he won the next term.

He passed Christmas in Switzerland. On his return he found his father seriously ill with hemorrhage of the brain, so Rupert undertook the temporary management of the House at Rugby. Mr. Brooke died suddenly and was buried on the very day the fifty boys were coming back to School Field. Rupert continued to act as Housemaster for ten weeks till the end of the term. Then the family moved to 24 Bilton Road, Rugby. Rupert went back to Grantchester for most of the May term and worked diligently off a monograph on the Elizabethan drama.

The next event was a journey abroad at the beginning of 1911. He spent three months at a "pension" in Munich frequented by English clergymen and ladies. A realistic picture of traveling second-class with two Germans from Bologne to Milan is given in a Shakespearean sonnet entitled:

DAWN

Opposite me two Germans snore and sweat.
Through sullen swirling gloom we jolt and roar.
We have been here forever; even yet
A dim watch-tells two hours, two aeons, more.
The windows are tight-shut and slimy-wet.
With a night's foetor. There are two hours more:
Two hours to dawn and Milan; two hours yet.
Opposite me two Germans sweat and snore. . . .

One of them wakes, and spits, and sleeps again.
The darkness shivers. A wan light through the rain
Strikes on our faces, drawn and white. Somewhere
A new day sprawls; and, inside, the foul air
Is chill, and damp, and fouler than before. . . .
Opposite me two Germans sweat and snore.

In Florence he visited his godfather, Robert Whitelaw of Warwickshire, and on his return settled down in Grantchester at "The Old Vicarage," next door to his former home. It was a long, low, ramshackle house with a wide veranda and a delightful sweet-perfumed garden opening on one of the really romantic "wiggles" of the Cam, just below the Mill and not far from Byron's Pool. He was to celebrate it later in his best poem. There he worked on his dissertation on John Webster, which he sent in before the end of the year. He was also preparing the book of "Poems," which Sidgwick and Jackson published in December. It met with a varied reception. The cynical "Saturday Review" told the author to "mar no more trees with writing love-songs in their barks." Edward Thomas in the Daily Chronicle prophesied that Brooke would become a poet. Many of the critics could not see past the unpleasant poems, seven out of fifty, which the young poet of 24 had not thought good to omit.

To gain access to books on Webster, Brooke went to London and spent whole days at the British Museum. Then at Grantchester he finished his dissertation, sometimes working all night. After Christmas he had a nervous breakdown, so he joined his mother at Cannes, and then spent a couple of months recuperating at Rugby. In March he and a friend went for a walking tour in Sussex. By April he was quite well again and went to Germany for several months. While in Berlin he expressed his homesickness in "Grantchester," his best idyllic poem. Here the conventional Sunday walk, known locally as "the Grantchester Grind," is seen through the rose-colored glasses that absence lends to the distant view. Homesick in a Berlin cafe, Brooke writes:

THE OLD VICARAGE, GRANTCHESTER

Just now the lilac is in bloom,
All before my little room;
And in my flower-beds, I think,
Smile the carnation and the pink;
And down the borders, well I know,
The poppy and the pansy blow.
Oh! there the chestnuts, summer through,
Beside the river make for you
A tunnel of green gloom, and sleep
Deeply above; and green and deep
The stream mysterious glides beneath,

RUPERT BROOKE'S MEMORIAL

He sleeps in Skyros, Grecian isle far-famed;
Mount Khokilas o'er him stands sentinel;
The sea foams at his feet. Not shot nor shell
Dealt sudden death—by sunstroke Brooke was claimed.
His soldier-comrades, weeping unashamed,
Hewed in the mountain vale a narrow cell—
A bit of England in a foreign dell—
And raised the wooden cross their hands had framed.

Five Aprils sped. Again on Shakespeare's day—
St. George's, too, when Brooke's soul fluttered Home—
An English friend took blocks of marble white—
Pentelic slabs shot with the sunset's light—
And built a monument where orchids bloom, bloom,
And mint and wild thyme scent the land-locked bay.

BELLE COOPER.

Green as a dream and deep as death. . . .
Would I were
In Grantchester, in Grantchester! . . .

Oh, is the water sweet and cool,
Gentle and brown, above the pool?
And laughs the immortal river still
Under the mill, under the mill?
Say, is there Beauty yet to find?
And certainly? And quiet kind?
Deep meadows yet, for to forget
The lies, and truths, and pain? . . . oh! yet
Stands the church clock at ten to three?
And is there honey still for tea?

Numbered All the Contemporary Great Among His Friends

SUMMER found him again at his beloved Grantchester. That autumn he frequently visited Edward Marsh in Gray's Inn, London, where he numbered among his friends Henry James, William Butler Yeats, John Masefield, Edmund Gosse, Walter de la Mare, Wilfrid Wilson Gibson, John Drinkwater and William Henry Davies. It was at Brooke's suggestion that Marsh decided to publish "Georgian Poetry, 1911-1912," an anthology introducing young English poets to the public.

In March of 1913 Rupert Brooke gained his fellowship at King's, as his father and his uncle had done before him. On May 22 the young man of 26 sailed on the Cedric for a year's travel in the United States, Canada and the South Seas. After seeing New York, he went up to Boston, visited Harvard and was delighted with the type of student there. From half-foreign Montreal he journeyed to Ottawa; there he presented a letter of introduction to Duncan Campbell Scott, and enjoyed a chat in the veteran poet's old-world garden. Scott gave him a card of introduction to Edmund Morris, the Toronto painter, and Brooke wrote enthusiastically of his reception by the members of the Arts and Letters Club. Niagara Falls was a glorious sight to the appreciative youth, who continued his journeys by Lake George, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver to San Francisco. At the University of California he met many students and was warmly welcomed by Dr. Charles Mills Gayley, himself a poet as well as a critic. He enjoyed the Golden State exceptionally. "California is nice," he wrote to Edward Marsh, "and the Californians a friendly bunch. There's a sort of goldenness about 'Frisco and the neighborhood. It hangs in the air, and about the people. Everyone is very cheery and cordial and simple. They are rather a nation apart, different from the rest of the States."

Brooke's "Letters from America," appeared in the Westminster Gazette, and are full of humorous delight in the New World. They have since been reprinted in book form with a preface by Henry James—the last thing James ever wrote for publication. It was his Ave atque Vale to the Greek god in modern guise destined to perish in the great war. James himself could take no active part therein, but at least he could, and did, become an English citizen.

Made a Trip to Samoan Islands and to Stevenson's Grave

RUPERT BROOKE sailed from San Francisco for Hawaii, Fiji, New Zealand and the Samoan Islands. At Tahiti he lingered for three months and made a pilgrimage to Stevenson's grave on the mountain above Vailima. He left Tahiti early in April, 1914, reached San Francisco before the month closed, and visited Arizona and the Grand Canyon en route to New York. He sailed from that harbor on May 29, on the same vessel with the Brownes—Maurice Browne

"New York is developing an accent as hideous as the cockney accent of London.

"A New York second-hand dealer moved to Brooklyn. He called his new home The Cloisters.

"'It's a nice joint ye got here, aw right, aw right,' his partner said to him, 'but why do ye call it The Cloisters? Wot's the idea?'

GEORGE COHAN was talking at the Lambs Club about a very popular songbird revue:

"Is she good?" a poet asked.

"Well," said Mr. Cohan, "I have known more assiduous church-goers."

"Oh, you know what I mean. Is she good? Has she got a good voice?" persisted the poet.

"Her voice is insured for $250. Her figure is insured for $300,000."

Proving His Knowledge

SENATOR CAMERON of Arizona tells of a young lawyer out in his State who made a big hit back in the early days of that commonwealth by the original manner in which he defined the meaning of the term "assault and battery."

This young disciple of Blackstone was employed to defend a fellow charged with assault and battery, and, as it was his first case, was floundering considerably in his presentation of the evidence.

The county attorney sought to further disconcert him by interrupting with the loud, derisive remark: "May it please Your Honor, I don't believe this young fellow knows what an assault and battery is."

Shaking his fist in the prosecutor's face, the lawyer retorted: "That is an assault," and then following it with a husky blow on the jaw, said: "And that is battery."

"Hanged if I thought he had so much sense," mumbled the surprised prosecutor as he sat down and rubbed his jaw.

SAMMY McINTYRE was captain of a schooner that plied between New York and points on the Jersey coast. One day his craft was loaded with brick, ready to start for New York, but Sammy gave no sign of attention to get under way. Instead he sat on deck smoking a pipe.

The owner of the brickyard, also owner of the schooner, who had reasons for wishing the brick in New York at the earliest possible moment, came hurrying on board and demanded the reason for Sammy's delay.

"There's no wind," said Sammy.

"What's the matter with you—no wind?" demanded the owner. "There's Jones's schooner under sail going down the river now."

"Yes, I have been watchin' her," said Sammy, "but it's no use my gettin' under way. Sure she's got the wind now, and to my mind, there ain't enough for two of us."

Not to be Cheated

VISCOUNTESS ASTOR said at a banquet in Baltimore:

"Old-fashioned people like Mr. Rudyard Kipling still object to women in the House of Commons. According to these people, every voting woman is—is—

"Well, I'll tell you a story.

"Two men, a fat man and a thin one, burst into the Pullman carriage of an express train. The fat man, who was heavily armed yelled:

"'Throw up your hands! We're goin' to rob all the gents and kiss all the gals.'

"But the thin man said gallantly:

"'No, No, pard. We'll rob the gents, of course, but the ladies—Heaven bless 'em—we won't harm a hair of their dear little heads."

"At this a severe, authoritative-looking woman shook her finger in a thin man's face.

"'You mind your business, young fellow,' she hissed. 'Your partner is robbing this train, not you.'"

Social Event

SENATOR CAPPER of Kansas, head of the "farm bloc," said in a Y.W.C.A. address in Topeka:

"Now that woman has been admitted to the House of Representatives, the House of Commons and the House of Lords, she must accept the responsibilities of those positions.

"Too many women still resemble Mrs. Tush. Poor old Tush came home pale and haggard the other evening and said with a gulp:

"'I must tell you, my love, that a receiver has been appointed for my business.'

"Mrs. Tush clapped her jeweled hands.

"'Oh, how lovely, isn't it?' she cried. 'And when will he receive? Sunday afternoons, I hope. I dote on Sunday afternoon receptions.'"

"'How's that?' he said to the janitor of the theater, when he got off the stage. 'Listen to them! Gee, I'll have to go out and bow again.'

"'Do you think that is applause?' the janitor sneered. 'Well, it ain't, young feller. It's just the folks killin' 'skeeters. You forgot this town's in the 'skeeter belt.'"

JOSEPH W. POWELL, who recently retired from the presidency of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, said at a dinner in Washington:

"A good many methods have been suggested for making the corporation pay. Most of them, though, are as wild as the methods of Rosenburg.

"Rosenburg ran a garage, but it burnt down, and he collected a large insurance. Then he ran a hotel, but it burnt down, too, and he collected insurance again. His next undertaking was a movie theater.

"He showed an old friend over the movie theater after he had bought it.

"'Do you think she'll go, Jim?' he said rather anxiously.

"'Sure she'll go,' Jim answered. 'Ain't she made of wood?'"

"WHICH reaches you the quicker," asked the clergyman, "sight or sound?"

"Sound, sir," answered Tommy, smartly.

"No," Tommy, that's not the right answer. Sight reaches us first. If you watch a band playing a good ways off, you'll see the drubmer hit the drum a second or so before you hear the sound of it."

"Yes, sir, but sometimes sound does reach you first."

"Can you give an example?"

"Yes, sir. The new church hall. Dad said this morning that we had been hearing about it for the last ten years, and wouldn't see it for the next twenty!"

The Tiger's Teeth

THE visit of Georges Clemenceau to the United States has brought publication of numerous stories about the famous French Tiger. Here is one of them:

Some years ago Clemenceau accompanied the venerable M. Fallieres, then President of the French republic, on a voyage to the Pyrenees district, during the course of which they reached a small village perched high upon a mountainside.

The statesmen attended the inauguration of a new fountain. The Mayor, in welcoming the distinguished visitors from Paris, lauded the republican regime, bestowed great compliments upon the virtues, civic and otherwise, of the President and the Premier, and spoke at great length. Clemenceau listened with visible impatience to the oration until the Mayor remarked that the village had been built originally upon a mountainside to protect it against the attacks of Moors and Saracens.

"You've succeeded remarkably well," Clemenceau cut in, "for since our arrival here we haven't met a single one of them."

The end of the Mayor's speech was lost in the storm of laughter.

"The ring's found," he said.

Immediately the clerk rushed off to get the manager, who at once came in and started to congratulate the man.

"Have you got it with you?" he asked.

"Oh, no," replied the man; "but I've only just come along that way and it wasn't there, so it's found."

PROLOGUE

To an outsider there would seem to be something furtive and altogether too secretive about Bill Potter's social activities . . . to the Potters, however, this phenomenon presents different aspects as viewed by different members of the family. . . . Mamie, for instance, is a bit contemptuous of Bill's various conquests. . . . To her they are all pretty much alike, except that some are dumber than others. . . . To Ma the problem of keeping Bill in nights is almost as simple in its outlines as keeping the cat out nights, the only difference being that the cat occasionally, responding to that cosmic urge, will go out of its own volition, whereas Bill will never stay in if he can help it. . . . To Pa, it presents a problem for spasmodic exhibitions of the stern parent role, followed by long periods of passive bewilderment. . . . As for Bill, "Aw, gee whiz! You'd think I was a baby or somep'n. . . . They make me sick. . . . Ain't a fellow got a right to live his own life or nothin'?"

Scene I

(Bill Potter has taken the latest object of his affections, Anabelle McLuckie, to Joyland, that huge arena where young couples wrestle rhythmically—as ten earnest epileptics fill the evening air with assorted union snorts and wheezes. . . . Anabelle is a telephone operator, one of those keen misses who can always get your number except when on duty . . . naturally, she has seen through Bill's pretensions long ago, but Bill doesn't know it yet, and never will if she can help it.)

BILL (dexterously steering clear of one of those mad dashing couples for whom dancing consists of making as many laps around the hall as possible before the music stops:) Heads up! Where do you think you're goin'? (Under his breath.) Big stiffs!

ANABELLE (admiringly:) My! you talk right up to em, don't you?

BILL (louder—the mad dashers are now banking the turn at the end of the hall, so Bill can speak freely:) Yes. Big stiffs! They must be tired of life. I'd kick him in the shins, only these are my new shoes.

(The trap drummer suddenly goes crazy and strikes at everything within reach, with a deafening result.)

BILL (thrilled:) Attaboy! That's what I call dance music.

(The mania spreads to the saxophonist—presumably, the drummer bit him.)

ANABELLE (as saxophonist pants his way up three scales and then dives off head first, landing on the end of his register with a low moan:) Gee! that's swell! There's something about saxophone music that—

BILL (exuberantly:) Me, too. When I hear them saxophones moan it makes me feel like—like—well, like—

ANABELLE (with sympathetic interest:) Same with me, too. Isn't it funny it should affect us both that way?

(Not funny—fundamental.)

BILL (as the orchestra suddenly gets together on "Home, Sweet Home":) Gee, I didn't know it was so late. Gosh, you're a stepper.

ANABELLE (softlyq:) Oh, no; you're the one that can dance. I should think you'd get tired dancing with me.

BILL (taking all the line and half the pole:) I should say not! (As the orchestra sadly snorts for home, sweet home.) Darn that tune! I hate it, don't you?

ANABELLE (dutifully:) I can't stand it. (Brightly.) I bet if that fellow could hear music like this, he'd never written anything like that.

BILL (with more sense than sentiment:) If he was alive today, he'd never write it. Can you imagine a guy living in a flat writin' about home, sweet home?

(Anabelle cannot imagine it; and small wonder; it would tax a livelier imagination:

'Mid kitchenette apartments and duplex flats
Though we may roam,
Be it even an October lease with a thirty day clause,
There's no place like home.

Home, home, sweet, sweet home!
Be it ever so in-a-door,
There's no place like home.)

Scene II

(There is a fortune awaiting some inventor who will perfect a front door that will close noiselessly after midnight . . . he could get a fortune from Bill Potter's royalties alone.)

PA (stirring restlessly:) What's that?

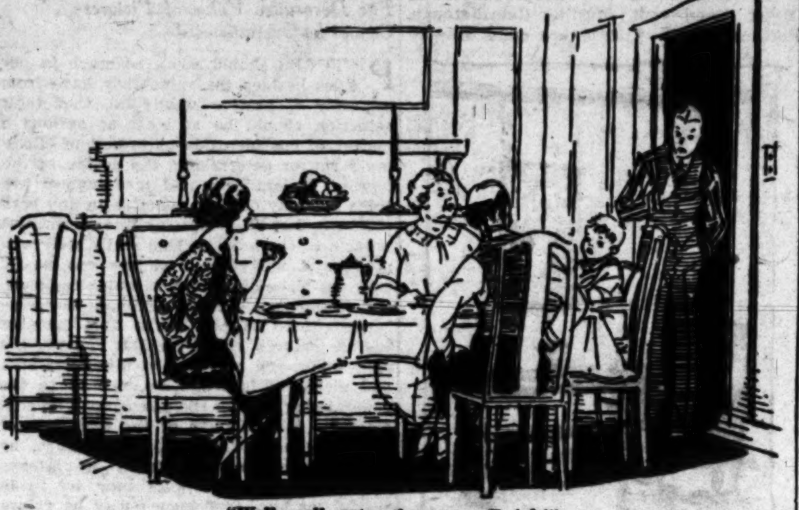
MA (who knows what it is:) I don't know. Never mind.

PA (aroused:) Is that that kid comin' home late again? What time is it, anyway?

MA (soothingly:) Oh, I don't know. It isn't late.

PA (groping under pillow for his radium faced wrist watch . . . focuses on dial with amazed unbelief:) Two o'clock! Say, I'm goin' to talk to that young—

Ma (protectively:) Now, now, Pa, don't say anything tonight. Talk to him in the morning. (Affectionately.) He's tired now.



"Well, well, enter the young Rajah!"

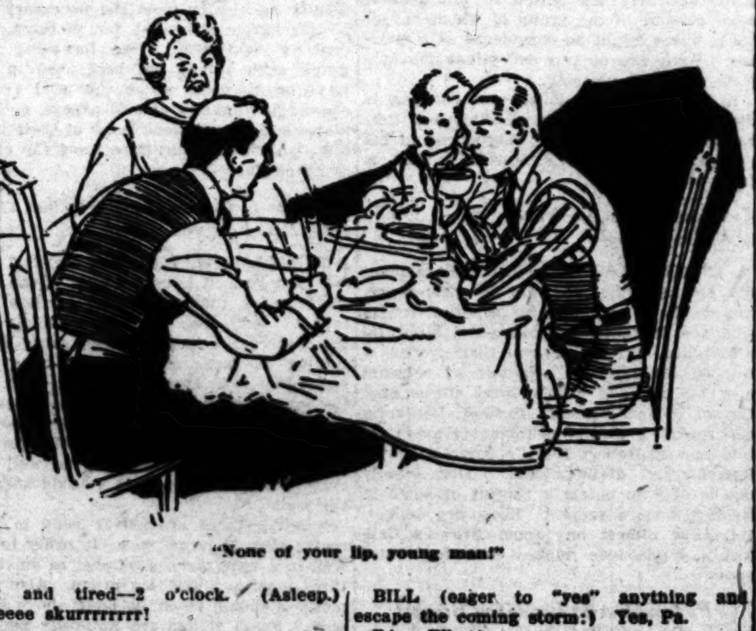
PA (belligerently:) He's tired? Say, why the hell shouldn't he be tired? Out all night like this, and then comin' in and wakin' me up. I'll—I'll—

MA: Now, now, Pa. Don't get excited and spoil your sleep. Just leave it go until morning, and you can talk to him at the breakfast table.

PA (secretly glad to postpone the ordeal, sinks back on pillow and mumbles to it:) He's got to stop this sort of thing. I'll—I'll—

MA (soothingly:) Now, Pa, there, there!

PA (subsiding, sleepily:) I'll—I'll—morning—breakfast—cut it out, young man—sick and tired—2 o'clock. (Asleep.) Kweeeeee skurrrrrrrr!



"None of your lip, young man!"

Scene III

(It is breakfast time, and Ma has had the usual trouble gathering them all together before everything is cold . . . they are all there finally except Bill, who has rolled over and sneaked three additional naps since Ma first called him . . . he may now be seen coming in jauntily but with secret misgivings, having overheard part of Ma and Pa's conversation last night.)

MAMIE (sarcastically: Well, well, enter the young Rajah! What time did you get in last night, Valentino?

BILL (glaring at her and trying to seat himself as inconspicuously as possible:) None o' your darn business.

MAMIE: If I was out as late as you every night, I'd get a paper route or a milk wagon and make some money on my way home.

BILL (flaring:) You and Red don't break no speed records gettin' home nights, and then you hang around in the hall until the neighbors think you're burglars and start callin' the police.

MA (with an apprehensive glance at Pa, who is beginning to coal up:) Now, children, stop the wrangling.

Pa (laying down some of Ma's hurried toast, to which the Potter dentist owes his prosperity:) Young man, I want to have a talk with you.

BILL (squirming:) Yes, Pa.

PA: How long do you think I'm goin' to stand your coming in here all hours of the night? What do you think I'm running here—sort of a hotel, or a community center, or something?

BILL (eager to "yes" anything and escape the coming storm:) Yes, Pa.

PA: What!

BILL (rattled:) Er—er—no, Pa.

PA: I'm goin' to put a stop to this. You're goin' to stop runnin' the street nights. You're goin' to be home and in bed by 10 o'clock every night.

BILL: But gee whiz, Pa, you treat me like I was a baby or somep'n.

PA (angrily:) Well, you're long ways from being a man yet. And until you are and have a roof of your own you'll do as I say.

MA (To Bill:) Pa's right. You should be in bed every night by 9 o'clock. One hour of sleep before midnight is worth three after, and, besides, you'll ruin your health.

BILL: Aw, my health—I got more health than anything else. I'd trade a little health for a little fun any day.

PA (pounding on table with knife:) None of your lip, young man! You're goin' to start keepin' regular hours in this house, and you're goin' to start tonight.

BILL (aghast:) But Pa, I got a date tonight to go to a swell hop.

PA: You've got a date to stay home and hop in a swell bed.

BILL: But I can't, Pa, tonight. Let me stay out tonight, and I—

PA: Did you hear what I said? You'll stay in tonight.

BILL: But Pa, listen. I—

PA (furiously:) No; you listen! If you're not in bed by 10 oclock tonight, you and I are going to the mat. I mean it, now. I'm not going to have any more of this monkey business.

BILL (rebelliously:) Gee! none of the other fellows are cooped up in the house like me. I don't see why I can't go out if I behave myself. It's a darn outrage, that's what it is!

PA (glaring:) It is, is it? Outrage, huh? I'll "outrage" you, if I catch you comin' in at 2 o'clock in the morning again.

BILL (hopelessly:) But Pa, listen. I gotta tonight. I just gotta!

PA: None o' your lip!

BILL (wailing:) Aw, gee whiz!

(Telephone rings, and Bill rushes out to the hall to answer it.)

MAMIE (to Pa, in Bill's defense, now that Bill is out of hearing:) I wouldn't be so hard on the poor kid.

PA (asserting himself proudly:) Who's doing this.

BILL (on the telephone in the hall:) But listen, Anabelle, gee whiz; he kicked up an awful fuss . . . no, don't do that . . . gee whiz! can't you understand I'm not tryin' to get out of it . . . all right, all right, then, I'll risk it, but . . . maybe I can sneak in, but he'll be terribly sore. All right, I'll pick you up at the house at 9 . . . all right, I gotta hang up now . . . good-by.

PA (to Ma, rising decisively:) You watch how I handle this—I'll stop this running around all hours of the night. You'll see.

MA: Now, don't be too harsh, Pa. You wasn't such an angel when you was Bill's age.

(Mamie meanwhile has slipped out to Bill, who is gazing dejectedly at telephone.)

BILL (to Mamie:) I promised Anabelle to take her to that dance, and she says if I don't take her she knows somebody else who will.

MAMIE (looking around carefully:) What are you going to do?

BILL: I'm goin' to take her. What do you think of that?

MAMIE: Attaboy! Never weaken. The first hundred girls are the hardest. But I hope Pa won't catch you comin' in late tonight.

BILL (earnestly:) So do I.

(So do we.)

(And that's that—until next Sunday.)

THE HOW IN HOUSES

HOW TO PLAN HOW TO BUY HOW TO SAVE

HOW TO SELECT AND HANG PICTURES

IN THE hanging of pictures any suggestions or rules are useless if the pictures are not worth a position on the wall. The selection is, therefore, of primary importance. There are some pictures that are more suitable for the living-room than they are for any other. Others may be immediately classed as dining-room or as bedroom pictures.

Then there is another phase to this suitability. For instance, we might select a number of pictures, each one of which is suitable for any one room but which cannot be used together. This may be due to lack of unity in color, in subject, of medium in which the picture is produced. Also they may not make a good one-room group on account of too great a variability in size or character of the frames. Plaster frames and wooden ones, for instance, make a poor combination.

Besides the points stated above there is another that must be kept in mind in building up a unit of pictures for a living-room. That is the style of the over-mantel pictures. There are decorators who have given a great deal of time to the study of the proper kind of pictures to be used for this purpose.

Pictures Hung Over Mantel Should Show Little Perspective

FAMILY portraits or photographs are usually considered entirely too personal to be put on exhibit in any room frequented by others than the members of the family. On the other hand famous portraits or their copies are much in use and appropriately so as over-mantel pictures. Of the best known masters of the portrait we need only mention Van Dyck and Rembrandt, the former of the Flemish school and the latter of the Dutch, and Velasquez. A wise selection might be the "Princess Mary Stuart," and the "Prince of Orange," or "William II of Nassau," by Van Dyck, or "The Man With a Fur Cap,'" or a "Portrait of Himself," by Rembrandt.

Over-mantel pieces are usually selected from some other group than landscapes or marines as these two groups of easel pictures are executed with the idea of expressing a view into the distance; they become a definitely selected extra window of the room. Structurally such a view could never be through a chimney. For this reason portraits have become a very much used over-mantel decoration. Such pictures contain practically no perspective.

Pictures with quite a little color are often selected for the mantel because frequently the space where they hang receives little direct light. The colors should, therefore, be brilliant rather than dull that a contrast may be expressed. On account of these light conditions, mirrors are also frequently used over the mantel.

There is no end to the number of good pictures of the character just discussed from which a choice might be made for a child's room. Among some of these good ones are: "Don Carlos Baltasas," by Velasquez; "The Melon Eaters," by Murillo, and "The Three Children of Charles I," by Van Dyck. It is better to have a copy of one of these for a child to contemplate than a border of jumping rabbits or waddling geese, attractive as these may be.

One Should Not Make a Hurried Choice of Pictures

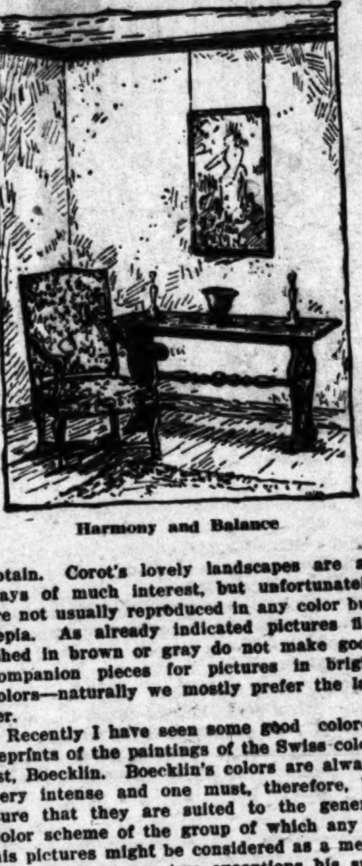
IN PICTURE stores only a limited amount of the stock can be displayed at one time and if the stock does not contain a picture to suit the individual taste or pocketbook the purchase should be deferred. Picture buying may easily become a drudgery unless one knows some things to ask for.

There are always excellent prints or reproductions of fine originals, as well as originals themselves, that are kept put away unframed, and it is an advantage to select one of these because it can be framed to suit the buyer's taste and to suit the home for which it is intended.

We do not always need to buy reproductions or prints from the works of old masters. While these are excellent for present-day decoration, we have a wealth of material of more recent date from which to select—at the same time not forgetting that very often old prints may be picked up at a very reasonable price.

Among reprints of relatively recent date are those of Turner's marine pictures. They are interesting in subject and excellent in color. They are good for a living-room or for a hall, and range in price from $4 to $10. These pictures belong to the group of large rather than of small pictures. Almost any store that carries a supply of pictures will have several of Turner's.

Most of us do not tire of reproductions of Millet, Rembrandt, Murillo, Gainsborough. Fortunately all of them are quite easy to obtain. Corot's lovely landscapes are always of much interest, but unfortunately are not usually reproduced in any color but sepia. As already indicated pictures finished in brown or gray do not make good companion pieces for pictures in bright colors—naturally we mostly prefer the latter.



Harmony and Balance

Recently I have seen some good colored reprints of the paintings of the Swiss colorist, Boecklin. Boecklin's colors are always very intense and one must, therefore, be sure that they are suited to the general color scheme of the group of which any of his pictures might be considered as a member. With one or two exceptions his subjects are very pleasing.

In a room where delicacy of coloring is the keynote do not overlook Whistler. Perhaps the most frequently reproduced of his pictures is "Whistler's Mother." This is deservedly popular.

American Artists Are Not to be Overlooked

ALTHOUGH Whistler was an American by birth he was not by preference. Yet we have a number of superior artists who are distinctly American—by birth, by preference, by character of their work. A few of these whose originals or reprints may be obtained in our local stores are: Chase, Wendt, Machtel, Puthuff, Benjamin C. Brown. If one is so fortunate as to obtain one of Robert Henri's portraits he is immediately distinguished. Occasionally one is able to obtain a reprint of some of Redfield's snow scenes. These are delightful. For almost any room Brown's California landscapes make charming color spots.

The Panama-Pacific Exposition Brought Much Art to California

IT WOULD take too much time and space to mention even the most prominent artists associated with the Panama-Pacific Exposition, but perhaps most of all we owe a debt to the man who had charge of all of the color of the exposition—Jules Guerin. Mr. Guerin is not only a consummate colorist but also a great designer. Fortunately many colored reproductions have been made of a great variety of his pictures and may be obtained at very reasonable prices. Reprints of his paintings of ancient Egypt, Italy and France, as well as those of notable buildings in the esatern part of our own country may be obtained in all sizes, from that of the Century print to some two feet in length.

Also from the exposition we have Frank Brangwyn's series of mural decorations of the "Elements." These may also be obtained in color. Right here we might say that if etchings are desired Mr. Brangwyn's may be recommended for consideration.

The Decorative Value of Pictures Cannot be Overestimated

PICTURES should mean so much in our lives besides the value they have from a purely decorative standpoint, that their selection should be at least as serious a matter of consideration as is that of choosing a rug or determining the design of the house. Insignificant and meaningless pictures not only do not affect us in any serious way but they destroy the decorative scheme of our homes. One really well-composed and well-colored picture can easily take the place of a dozen meaningless ones.

It is impossible to overestimate the decorative uses that may accrue from the wise use of pictures, and since this is true, the size, color and relation to other pictures and pieces of furniture, as well as to the general character of the house, must be considered. A dark room or the dark side of a room can be lightened, for instance, by using bright colors painted in intense values. Overkeyed rooms may be made restful, or low-keyed rooms may be raised in tone by the judicious use of pictures.

The wall covering as the background of the picture is of paramount importance. In general a patterned background is most destructive to the artistic value of the picture. There are exceptions to this. Oftentimes a small all-over pattern may be used with good effect. Also large and even irregularly patterned paper may be used as background for quite large pictures with heavy frames.

In general flowered and landscape papers create a mental disturbance which is contrary to the effect produced by the structural lines of the room. They produce a feeling of restlessness and confusion which is far from the desirable one of rest and dignity and is far from the necessary simple background desired for pictures. Except as mentioned in the foregoing paragraph such papers are best used in hallways or in rooms which are used as passageways. Against figured papers, not only pictures commonly lose much of their value, but also graceful furniture loses the charm of its outline.

Simplicity in Picture Hanging is the Rule Best Followed

USUALLY rooms are too crowded with pictures. It is better to have the room undecorated than too full. As has been said by some one the overcrowding of a room gives the impression of many people talking at once. One picture hung in a space that is in harmony with it, that is, of the same general shape as the picture, is much more satisfactory than a group of pictures. A picture that hangs with its long side horizontal will not look as well in a vertical panel as it will in a broad space on the wall.

Small pictures are better hung in small rooms than in large ones. In order to look well in a large room a number of small pictures must be hung in a group. Also small pictures should never be hung above larger ones. Small things are naturally pendant.

One of the most important considerations in the hanging of pictures is the question of support. A picture should always be placed with reference to a group or to a piece of furniture, that is, it should be hung over it that the furniture may act as a support. The difficulty here is that if the picture hangs low, a vase or a lamp on a stand under it may be high enough to hide part of the frame or picture. This should not be permitted.

Pictures should not tip forward, but should hang flat against the wall. If possible the picture wire should be concealed. Otherwise the wires should hang vertically and not make an angle with the horizontal lines of the room. An exception to this is in the hanging of round or of oval pictures. With such pictures the wires or cords should come to a point at the top that they may be in keeping with the character of the picture. Ceiling wires should be used on very large pictures only and even then the wire should be as little conspicuous as possible. For this reason cords are usually out of place.

Side Lights

RECEDING AND ADVANCING COLORS

It is well to remember that blue-gray is a receding color and that its use on walls gives the appearance of greater distance. On the contrary, yellow, especially in its orange tints, is an advancing color with a tendency to bring the walls closer together in effect.

BATHROOM ACCESSORIES

Many a bathroom would be vastly improved both in appearance and in convenience by the addition of new equipment, such as towel racks, soap dishes, tumbler holders and other such necessary accessories. These come in glass, in porcelain and in various enamels, as well as in metal. In colored enamel they make a decorative feature.

TRAYS IN VARIETY

Trays of glass, or mahogany and glass, of silver, of porcelain, of pewter, of copper and of all sorts of materials are shown at the shops in time for the buyer of gifts for Christmas to make a selection.

The Married Life of Helen and Warren

BY MABEL HERBERT URNER

Lost in the Maze of a London Fog Helen Has an Adventurous Night

"GREAT guns, what a night! Thick as pea soup!" muttered Warren, as they came out from the Alhambra into the black shroud of a London fog.

"No street lights? Are they all out?" dismayed Helen.

"So thick you can't see 'em."

Even the light studded theater sign blurred only a few feet through the fog.

The crowd surging out clamored for taxis. But the doorman shouted that all surface traffic had been suspended.

This alarming announcement caused a concerted rush for the underground—the Leicester Square station close by.

"We'll have to walk. The tube won't take us much nearer the Metropole."

"It's getting thicker every minute," Helen clung to his arm. "Can't see a step before you."

"Good thing they stopped the traffic—there'd be some nasty accidents."

Through the darkness tore a woman's cry, its shrillness weirdly muffled. Then shouts of "Stop thief!"

In the excited jostle of the crowd, a rush from behind pushed them apart.

For a panicky moment Helen was alone. Then Warren's tall form loomed reassuringly just ahead.

"Oh," as she caught his arm, "don't let them push between us! I'd be terrified if we got separated."

Drawing her closer, he steered her through the now thinning crowd.

There was a shuddery eeriness about it all. The fog-muffled voices seemed curiously hushed and far away.

"Are we going right? Dear, you're sure we haven't turned off?"

No answer. Only the tap of his cane, exploring each step ahead of them.

"Dear, do you know just where we are?" worried by his silence.

"We're all right. You're safe with me!"

The voice was not Warren's! In the fog she had taken the arm of a stranger!"

Terror racing through her, she tried to draw away.

"Now, girlie, don't get frightened! Where d'you want to go?"

"Hotel Metropole," she faltered.

"Right-o, I'll take you there. We're steering for the Strand now. My word, you've got a flossy little hand! But you're not very hefty, are you?"

Stifling a scream, she tried to struggle from his appraising hold.

"Now, don't get flighty! I know a cosy place near here. We'll get a drink—and wait for this to lift."

"No—no! I'll find my way back alone."

"You're coming along with me. We'll have a bit of supper."

"Warren! Warren!" but her cry was futile in the sound-deadening fog.

"Who's the Warren cove? I'll take better care of you than he did. You won't get away from me so easy."

Drawing her on through the blinding mist, they collided with a mail box.

The cane knocked from his hand rattled to the pavement. As he stooped to pick it up, with a jerk Helen freed her arm and plunged recklessly ahead.

"No you don't! You don't give me the slip like that!" He was almost upon her, when she turned sharply to the right, running against an iron railing.

She had eluded him! His angry shouts grew fainter. No, he had turned back!

Stealthily, her heart in her throat, she felt along the railing to a gate. Pushing it open she groped her way down basement steps.

Crouching against an iron-barred door, she waited breathlessly until he gave up the search and passed on, his angry mutterings swallowed in the fog.

Warren would be frantic! Somehow she must get back to the hotel.

There was no sound of passers-by, no one to whom she could call. The ominous hush grew terrifying.

A faint whimper. Silence. Then again that pathetic whine.

Never afraid of dogs, Helen whistled and called softly.

The next moment a shaggy Irish terrier was rubbing against her feet.

"Poor doggie, you lost, too?" feeling the plate on his collar, which she could not read. "You'd better stay with me—I'll send you home tomorrow."

Tying her long gloves together, she knotted one end under his collar.

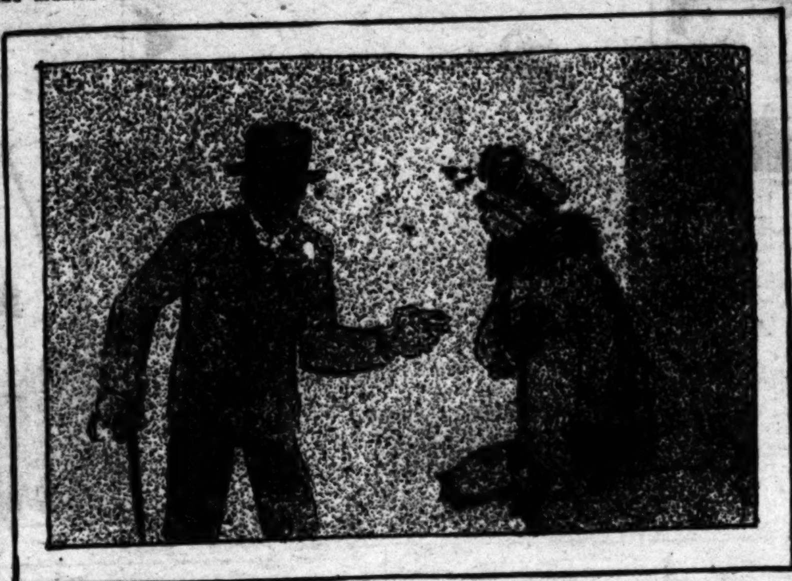
The friendly companionship of the dog giving her courage, she started on, feeling each step before her.

Though she had lost all sense of direction, she could not stand still. The strain of inaction was unendurable.

"Here Razz! Razz!" the call came faintly through the fog.

A joyous yelp and an excited tug at the improvised leash.

"Razz! Razz! Where are you, old boy?" the muffled voice came nearer.



The dog was gone, dragging with him one of her gloves.

"Now we'll have to put your leash on," above the gleeful barks. "What's this tied to your collar? A glove? Somebody been trying to kidnap you?"

The voice was now receding. With a flash of courage, Helen called out:

"Wait just a moment! I found the dog—we were both lost. I'm trying to get to the Metropole. Can you tell me where we are?"

"This is St. Martin's Lane, not far from Charing Cross," his dark form more distinct. "If you'll permit me, I'll be glad to help you find the way."

"Oh, thank you," his voice and ownership of the dog inspired trust.

As she stumbled over a curbstone, he suggested that she take his arm.

A swift upward glance at his face, faintly lit by a glowing cigar, confirmed her confidence

"If you don't mind, I'll smoke. It gives a little light."

"It's terrifying—this fog! I've often heard of the London fogs—but I didn't think they were ever as dense as this."

"They rarely are. I remember only one other—several years ago. I started for the Liberal Club and found myself by the lions at Trafalgar Square."

"That's curious. In one of the magazines there was a story of a girl lost in a fog who located her way by the Trafalgar Square lions."

"I read that! An army chap steers her to the hotel. By George, it was the Metropole, too! That's a coincidence. Called 'Love in a Fog,' wasn't it?"

"I've forgotten now," flushing at the subtle change in his attitude.

Did he think she had deliberately brought up that story?

"And the girl was an American, too!" he persisted. "We should've met in Trafalgar Square and had the setting complete."

With flaming self-consciousness, Helen ignored this swift progress.

How could she say that she was Mrs. Curtis and that her husband, desperately anxious, would be waiting at the Metropole? She should have said that in the beginning. Now he thought she had been leading him on.

"I'm glad I'm not disappointed," as they passed under a blurred light.

"In what?" not sensing the trap before the question escaped.

"In you!" gazing down at her. "I'd like you to read that story again. If I can find it, I'll send it to you tomorrow."

Here was her chance to say something about her husband, but as she groped for words, he took her silence for encouragement.

"Razz deserves a medal for finding you. There's a discriminating dog!"

"He's a dear," nervously. "All Irish terriers are."

"Oh, I say, don't limit that to Irish terriers."

Trying to convey reproof by her silence, Helen drew slightly away.

The fog was lifting. They could see the misty lights of Charing Cross.

"Here we are at the Grand. Let's go in the grill and have supper. I know it's jolly informal," interrupting her quick protest, "but it's only across the street from your hotel."

"Oh—I—I must get back quickly as I can. They'll be so worried."

She hated herself for the "they." Why had she not said "my husband"?

"But you're going to let me see you again," reluctantly he guided her across Northumberland avenue.

"Why I—we're staying in London only a few days."

"May I 'phone you in the morning? Here's my card," she felt him fumbling in his pocket. "Won't you give me yours?"

Hastily Helen produced one from her purse. It was an easy way out of an awkward situation. After he left her, he would read "Mrs. Warren E. Curtis."

They were at the Metropole now. She recognized the portal lights, nebulous arcs, not quite obliterated by the fog.

"I—I don't know how to thank you," she paused at the steps. Then stopping to pet the dog, "And if Razz hadn't—"

"Jove, Kitten, I've been worried!" Warren pounced upon her from the shadowy doorway. "Where in blazes have you been?"

"Oh, it's been awful!" clinging to him. "I'd be lost yet if this gentleman hadn't helped me." Then turning, "I want to introduce my husband, Mr. Curtis."

"Lawton's my name," briefly. "I was fortunate in happening along. I believe this is your glove, Mrs. Curtis. Now you're safe, I'll say good night."

"Who's that stiff?" demanded Warren, drawing her into the glowing lobby. "How'd he get your glove?"

"I'd tied it to the collar of his dog," hastily explaining the incident.

"Huh, he didn't seem overjoyed at meeting me. Did he think you were unattached?" Then as they entered the lift, "Good thing you turned up when you did—I was just about to start something. How in thunder did we get separated?"

"I thought I was with you—in the dark I walked on beside someone else."

"Cold?" mistaking her shudder. "That fog's wet as rain."

"Yes, I feel drenched," as they turned down the red-carpeted hall.

"Better get your traps off and have something hot," unlocking their door. "How about a little supper up here? I could do with a snack myself."

"That's the third invitation to supper I've had tonight," laughed Helen a little hysterically, as she switched on the lightss.

"Eh? What's that?" sharply, throwing his hat and stick on the bed.

"You needn't worry! I didn't accept the other two." Then laughing at his scowl, "If I'm ever restless for an adventure—I'll know how to start one. I'll just get lost in a London fog!"

PEOPLE WE MEET

Church of St. Mark's In-the-Bouwerie. The rector, William Norman Guthrie, has done a fine thing. He has thrown his temple of worship open on Sunday afternoons to the writers and artists, actors, musicians and ministers of every creed.

And they have made these meetings memorable. It is considered an honor to be invited to read one's poetry or prose at St. Mark's.

George Jay Smith, poet and educational worker, usually conducts the meetings. Why could not Los Angeles do likewise and open some of her churches for the uplift and idealization of art?

Gamut Club Center of a Brilliant Gathering of Artists

MARY SHAW, the actress championed by most of the women and admired by all of the men, has long been president of the Gamut Club of New York. This club is the godchild of the Gamut Club of Los Angeles and I was honored at the banquet table at the right-hand of the president. She was just then playing Mrs. Malaprop, in "The Rivals," at the Empire Theater, with the Players' First Annual Classic Revival. At Miss Shaw's left, at the banquet, sat Rowena Blincoe, dramatic reader and former Los Angeles clubwoman, and with her was Mrs. Furness (Edith Ellis, author of "Mary Jane's Pa," and other plays.) It was a typical evening with many representative artists present and altogether delightful.

To leave New York without adding to a reading acquaintance with one of the most-talked-about New Yorkers would be a pity. So my lady and I went to the impromptu premiere performance of "The Old Soak" and joined the reception in the lobby to Don Marquis. Miss Neeta Marquis, the Los Angeles poet, cousin of the author, did the presentation honors. Everybody who could get there was there, that is, of course, except Congressman Volstead and his friends. "The Old Soak" play was not written as prohibition propaganda, but it is an intensely interesting human play and a long run, no doubt, will be its reward.

But, back in Greenwich Village, in imagination, White Hope must be pulled in from her concrete block in the six-by-eight backyard. I hope the long ribbon does not break for White Hope is hungry. I have finished hammering about gods and men of ancient Greece and Troy on William Griffith's typewriter of the vintage of 1892.

There are liver and shrimps and chicken breast for the cat. It is nearly night, Mr. Griffith will be home soon.

Or will he?

I can see White Hope looking at me reprovingly at the thought.

The Montessori method of teaching is like scattering food for chickens to find, instead of cramming it down their throats.

Brightest Star in the Celestial Sphere

An Illuminating Account of Sirius and the Discovery of His Heretofore Unknown Companion.

BY W. H. KNIGHT.

SIRIUS, the most resplendent of all the so-called fixed stars, is now shining in the eastern heavens in our winter evening skies. It is southeast of the magnificent constellation Orion, and in line with the three familiar stars forming the belt of the mighty hunter.

It is sometimes called the Dog Star because it is the principal brilliant of Canis Major, the greater dog which is following Orion, as Procyon, farther north, is the bright star in Canis Minor, the lesser dog. These two faithful dogs keep close to great Orion as he strides across the celestial vault, menacing Taurus, the angry bull, whose eye, red Aldebaran, flashes fire as he threatens to impale the hunter on his horns.

Above Orion's belt are Betelgeuse and Bellatrix, in his shoulders, and below are Saiph in one knee and splendid Rigel in his raised foot. Orion is the most famous of all the constellations in story, in poetry and in ancient legendary lore. That mysterious philosopher, Job, many centuries before Christ, noting the steadfast, unchanging stars, haughtily asks, "Canst thou loose the bands of Orion?" For, during all the historic ages, these three stars have been pointing westerly to Aldebaran and the Pleiades, and easterly to the wonderful star Sirius.

Its name was probably derived from the very ancient, Egyptian god, Osiris, on account of its supposed influence in producing the fertilizing floods of the River Nile, but later it was latinized by the Romans into its present form—Sirius.

Magnifying Instruments Have Broadened Scope of Knowledge

SINCE the study of the stars with magnifying instruments became the basis of the present science of astronomy, the leading brilliants in the sky have been the subject of assiduous, painstaking investigation. First, they ascertained that a parallax in which the diameter of the earth's orbit—186,000,000 miles—was the base line, showed that Alpha Centauri, a bright star in the southern celestial hemisphere, is twenty-five millions of millions of miles distant from our solar system. For convenience this enormous distance was translated into so-called light years, and it was found that a ray of light which travels through space in the almost unthinkable rate of 186,300 miles in each second of time, would consume four and one-third years in crossing the mighty void that exists between Alpha Centauri and the earth.

Then many astronomers concentrated their efforts in an endeavor to obtain the parallax of Sirius; first, because it is the brightest star in the heavens, and second, because with instruments of great refinement, it exhibits a perceptible motion among the stars. At length, less than a century ago, it was found that Sirius is fifty millions of millions of miles distant, or, in other words, eight and one-half light years away. Thus, the light from that star which enters our eyes this evening, left Sirius in the year 1914, or at about the beginning of the great European war.

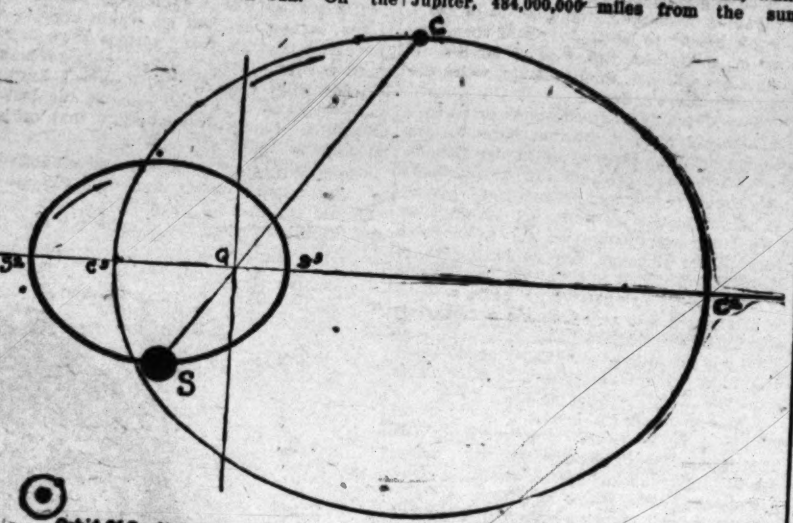
German Astronomer Discovers Companion to Sirius

WHILE these investigations were going on, a distinguished German astronomer, F. W. Bessell, observed that the proper motion of Sirius was not in a straight line, but that it swerved, now to the right, then to the left, and he found that these alternate motions were repeated once in about half a century, whence he inferred that the great star was swerved from side to side by a massive companion.

This was a brilliant thought, but as no such companion had been detected by the small telescopes of those early years, how could its existence be proved? In 1862 Alvan Clark at Cambridge, Mass., was constructing a large telescope for the Northeastern University at Chicago. His son pointed the instrument to Sirius, which was shining in the eastern sky. "Why father," he exclaimed, "Sirius has got a companion." The discovery proved to be genuine, and furthermore, the companion was in the exact position assigned to it at the date by Bessell. This important discovery, confirming the truth of Bessell's theory, excited universal interest and was hailed as a triumph of human genius.

The next step was, by mathematical formulae, to ascertain with precision the respective masses of the two bodies. The conclusion which has been reached by a consensus of computers is, that the great star Sirius has a mass two and a half times that of our sun, but, owing to its early stage of development, it shines with a brilliancy thirty times greater than that of our sun.

The mass is so great, the internal heat is so intense, and the convection currents so strong, that the two lightest chemical elements known to us—hydrogen and helium, are driven to the surface and blaze with a fierce brightness, unapproached even by the seething fires of our own sun. On the other hand its companion, which has a mass only about three-fourths that of our sun, seems to have radiated much of its heat off into space, and presents the aspect of a dying sun, for its brightness is only about one-four-hundredths that of our sun, which accounts for the fact that it was not detected by the early astronomers who were observing with comparatively small instruments.



Orbit Of Earth Around Sun On Same Scale.

This diagram shows the two orbits of the great binary star, Sirius. The thick line represents the smaller orbit of the great Primary, the other larger and very eccentric orbit being that of the smaller Companion. The Companion does not move round the Primary as a center, but both bodies move round their common center of gravity at G., where the fine lines cross each other. Wherever the Primary or his Companion may be in their respective orbits they are always on opposite sides of the center of gravity at G.

But the masses of the two bodies was determined by the length of their respective orbits, as they circled round each other, and the velocity with which they moved in their orbits. Another factor which was taken into consideration was the known distance of that binary system from our own sun, derived from obtaining its parallax as above described.

Based on the result of these complicated and abstruse calculations astronomers have found that the two massive bodies which constitute the binary system of Sirius are moving round a common center of gravity at G where the fine lines cross in the diagram. The orbit of the companion is very eccentric, for at periastron, or nearest approach to its primary, its distance is only about 280,000,000 miles, or approximately twice the distance of the orbit of Mars as that planet moves round the sun. On the other hand when the companion is at apastron, or farthest distance from its primary, it is 2,900,000,000 miles distant, or 200,000,000 miles farther away than Neptune, our outer plant, is from the sun.

Two Heavenly Monsters Whirl at Great Velocity

BUT here comes another interesting fact: the average of these two distances is about 1,600,000,000 miles, or nearly equal to that of the planet Uranus, but while it takes years for Neptune to complete a revolution round the sun, and eighty-four years for Uranus to accomplish its orbital journey, the great companion of Sirius performs its much vaster orbital journey in just fifty and one-fourth years. This is due to the fact that these two bodies are so massive and exert such a mighty attractive force upon each other that they are compelled to move with great velocity round their center of gravity in order to prevent the catastrophy of falling into each other.

We have fine examples of this adjustment of velocities to distances in our own solar system. Thus Venus, 67,000,000 miles from the sun, moves in its orbit at the rate of only three and one-half miles per second.

The accompanying diagram, which is the essential part of a larger and more complicated diagram, showing the respective orbits of Sirius and its great companion, was kindly furnished expressly for this article by Mr. Charles P. Howard of Hartford, Ct., and it gives a clearer conception of the relative motions of these two bodies than has yet appeared in any other publica- about twenty-two miles per second, while Jupiter, 484,000,000 miles from the sun, moves in its orbit at the comparatively low rate of eight miles per second, and Neptune, the farthest planet, crawls along at tion. To understand the diagram, we must remember that the companion does not move round the primary as a stationary body, but that both bodies move round their common center of gravity at G, the primary and its companion always being on opposite sides of that center.

In other words, the companion, with three-fourths the mass of our sun, is powerful enough to swing its mighty primary, first to the right, then to the left, round this common center of gravity which is an absolutely vacant point in space.

And it was these peculiar movements of the brilliant primary, as observed by Bissell, that led him to suspect the true cause of that periodical oscillation of Sirius in its almost imperceptible motion along the celestial arch.

For be it remembered that Sirius is a great traveler. Some thirty millions of years ago that brilliant orb, only eight and one-half light years distant, is supposed to have been in line with stars along the western edge of the Milky Way, which are perhaps 100,000 light years distant, but during the period mentioned, Sirius has apparently moved across that shimmering band of light, and now shines in line with the stars on the eastern edge of the Galaxy.

And here it may be incidentally stated that Sirius is moving away from our location in the sidereal universe at the rate of eight miles per second, while our sun with its family of planets is going swiftly in an opposite direction at the rate of twelve miles per second, towards the group of stars in the Constellation Lyra, in which Vega is the principal brilliant. But it will be many, many centuries before the casual observer will note any perceptible changes in the stars of the constellations as now shown on our astronomical maps.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S PIGSKIN PACK

OF ALL the reminiscent items given to an interested public by intimate friends of the late Theodore Roosevelt the moving tale of the Pigskin Library is of most significance. Corinne Roosevelt Robinson, loving and beloved sister of this famous American, who presented him with the pigskin library, tells its history in her book of last year, from which it is abbreviated as follows:

"One quiet evening when we had had an especially lovely family dinner," (this was shortly before he left for his African trip,) "I turned to my brother and said: 'Theodore, I want to give you a real present before you go away. What do you think you would like?' His eyes sparkled as he replied . . . I think I should like a pigskin library . . . Of course I couldn't go anywhere, not even into African jungles, without a good many books . . . They would not last in ordinary bindings, and so I want them all bound in pigskin, and I would rather have that present than any other.'"

The list of books in Pigskin Library: (Carried in pigskin binding and enclosed in pigskin case on back of "burro," for evening and "off-day" reading during African trip.)

Bible and Apocrypha; Borrow's Bible in Spain; Zingali, Lavengro, Wild Wales, The Romany Rye; Complete Shakespeare; Spenser's Faerie Queen; Complete Marlowe; Mahan's Sea Power; Macauley's History, Essays, Poems; Homer's Illiad and Odyssey; Chanson de Roland; Carlyle's Frederick the Great"; Shelley's Poems; Bacon's Essays, Lowell's Literary Essays and Biglow Papers; Emerson's Poems; Longfellows Poem; Tennyson's Poems; Keats; Milton's Paradise Lost (Books I and II); Dante's Inferno (Carlyle's translation); Holmes's Autocrat of the Breakfast Table; Holmes's Over the Teacups; Bret Harte's Poems; Bret Harte's Argonauts; Bret Harte's Luck of Roaring Camp; Browning, Selected Poems; Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn and Tom Sawyer; The Federalist; Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; Fraissart's Chronicles; Gregorovius; Rome; Percy's Reliques; Euripides (Murray's translation;) Scott's Legend of Montrose; Scott's The Antiquary; Scott's Guy Mannering; Scott's Woo-Ray; Scott's Waverly; Cooper's Two Admirals; Cooper's The Pilot; Dickens's Pickwick Papers; Dickens's Our Mutual Friend; Thackeray's Vanity Fair; Thackeray's Pendennis.

This list is certainly worth half-an-hour's consideration by any student of human nature. It is as remarkable for what it omits as for what it includes. Its diverse character is doubtless in some degree, owing to the fact that Roosevelt's son was to accompany him and it was necessary to take his literary tastes into account, as well as Roosevelt's own inclinations. But even considering this fact the list is somewhat puzzling. For instance it is as susprising that the great man should have included Shelley's poems, as that he left out those of Byron, as remarkable that he should have wished for the rythmic lore of Emerson, as that he was not anxious to have close at hand the robust tribal lays of Kipling. The citizens of our republic have always believed that they knew the late ex-president as thoroughly as they approved of him. Yet there are not ten men in the country who, if they were requested to prepare a list of the books likely to please "the Colonel," would have duplicated this one.

It appears therefore that no human being, however acute and observing, can ever really encompass the individuality of another. For, as a wise man long ago observed: "As the moon turneth to the world only half her face, so doth the ego of thy closest friend." We are told that he later reported the "pigskin pack and its contents as being "the greatest possible comfort, a well-spring of pure pleasure." He also found much natural pleasure in the immense number of letters he received, filled, as these were, with good wishes from all sorts and conditions of men and women.

THE PROFITEERS

[illegible] "I hope things are better in your country, Mr. Wingate, but our young people go on anyhow now. Here's my niece drives a taxicab and is proud of it, my own daughter designs underclothes and sells them at a shop in [illegible] street to anyone who comes along, and my boy, who ought to go into the guards, prefers to go into Roger Kendrick's office. What are you going to start him at, Roger?"

"A pound a week and his lunch money, probably," Kendrick replied.

"I don't think he'll earn it," his fond mother said sadly. "However, that's your business. Don't forget you're dining with me Sunday night, John. I'll ask Josephine, too, if you succeed in making friends with her. She's a little difficult, but well worth knowing. Dear me, I wish people would begin to go! I wonder whether they realize that it is nearly 6 o'clock."

"I shan't stir a yard," Sarah declared, "until I have another ice. Jimmy, run and fetch me one."

"My family would be the last to help me out," Lady Amesbury grumbled. "I'm ashamed of the whole crowd of you round here. Roger, you and Mr. White are disgraceful, sitting and drinking whiskies and sodas and enjoying yourselves, when you ought to have been walking round the gardens being properly bored."

"I came to enjoy myself and I have done so," Kendrick assured her. "To add to my satisfaction, I have met my biggest client—at least he is my biggest client when he feels like doing things."

"Do you feel like doing things now, Mr. Wingate?" Sarah ventured.

Maurice White held out his hands in horror.

"My dear young lady," he exclaimed, "such questions are absolutely impossible! When a man comes on to a market, he comes on secretly. There are plenty of people who would give you a handsome check to hear Mr. Wingate's answer to that question."

"Anyone may hand over the check, then," Wingate interposed smilingly, "because my answer to Miss Baldwin is prompt and truthful. I do not know."

"Of course," Lady Amesbury complained, "if you are going to introduce a commercial element into my party—well, why don't you and Maurice, Roger, go and dance about opposite one another, and tear up bits of paper, and pretend to be selling one another things?—Hooray, I can see some people beginning to move! I'll go and speed them off the premises."

She hurried away. Sarah drew a sigh of relief.

"Somehow or other," she confessed, "I always feel a sense of tranquillity when my aunt has just departed."

Josephine rose to her feet.

"I think I shall go," she decided, "while the stock of taxicabs remains unexhausted."

"If you will allow me," Wingate said, "I will find you one."

Their farewells were a little casual. They were all, in a way, intimates. Only Kendrick touched Wingate on the shoulder.

"Shall I see you in the city tomorrow?" he asked.

"About 11 o'clock," Wingate suggested, "if that is not too early. There are a few things I want to talk to you about."

"Where shall I send my card?" Sarah called out after him.

"The Milan Hotel," he replied, "with terms, please."

She made a little grimace.

"Terms!" she repeated scornfully. "An American generally pays what he is asked."

"On the contrary," Wingate retorted, "he pays for what he gets."

"Your address?" Wingate asked, as he handed Josephine into a taxicab.

"Dredlinton House, Grosvenor Square," she answered. "You mustn't let me take you out of your way, though."

"Will you humor me," he asked. "There is something I want to say to you, and I don't want to say it here. May we drive to Albert Gate and walk in the park a little way? I can find you another taxi the other side."

"I should like that very much," she answered.

They spoke scarcely at all during their brief drive, or during the first part of their walk in the park. Then he pointed to two chairs under a tree.

"May we sit here?" he begged, leading the way.

She followed, and they sat side by side. He took off his hat and laid it on the ground.

"So one of the dreams of my life has been realized," he said quietly. "I have met Sister Josephine again."

She was for a moment transformed. A delicate pink flush stole through the pallor of her cheeks, her tired eyes were lit with pleasure. She smiled at him.

"I was wondering," she murmured. "You really hadn't forgotten, then?"

"I remember," he told her, "as though it were yesterday, the first time I ever saw you. I was brought into Etaples. It wasn't much of a wound but it was painful. I remember seeing you in that white stone hall, in your cool sister's dress. After the dust and horror of battle there seemed to be nothing in that wonderful hospital of yours but sunlight and white walls and soft voices. I watched your face as you listened to the details about my case—and I forgot the pain. In the morning you came to see how I was, and most mornings afterward."

"I am glad that you remember," she murmured.

"I have forgotten nothing," he went on. "I think that those ten days of convalescence out in the gardens of your villa and down by the sea were the most wonderful days I ever spent."

"I love to hear you say so," she confessed.

"Out there," he continued, "the whole show was hideous from beginning to end, a ghastly, terrible drama, played out among all the accompaniments which make hell out of earth. And yet the thing gripped. The tragedy of Ypres came and I escaped from the hospital."

"You were not fit to go. They all said that."

"I couldn't help it," he answered. "The guns were there, calling, and one forgot. I've been back to England three times since then, and each time one thought was foremost in my mind—'shall I meet Sister Josephine?'"

"But you never even made inquiries," she reminded him. "At my hospital I made it a strict rule that our names in civil life were never mentioned or divulged, but afterward you could have found out."

He touched her left hand very lightly, lingered for a moment on her fourth finger.

"It was the ring," he said. "I knew that you were married, and somehow, knowing that, I desired to know no more. I suppose that sounds rather like a cry from Noah's Ark, but I couldn't help it. I just felt like that."

"And now you probably know a good deal about me," she remarked, with a rather sad smile. "I have been married nine years. I gather that you know my husband by name and repute."

"Your husband is associated with a man whom I have always considered my enemy," he said.

"My husband's friends are not my friends," she rejoined, a little bitterly, "nor does he takes me into his confidence as regards his business exploits."

"Then what does it matter?" he asked. "I should never have sought you out, for the reason I have given you, but since we have met you will not refuse me your friendship? You will let me come and see you?"

She laughed softly.

"I shall be very unhappy if you do not. Come tomorrow afternoon to tea at 5 o'clock. There will be no one else there, and we can talk of those times on the beach at Etaples. You were rather a pessimist in those days."

"It seems ages ago," he replied. "Today, at any rate, I feel differently. I knew when I glanced at Lady Amesbury's card this morning that something was going to happen. I went to that stupid garden party all agog for adventure."

"Am I the adventure?" she asked lightly.

He made no immediate answer, turning his head, however, and studying her with a queer, impersonal deliberation. She was wearing a smoke-colored muslin gown and a black hat with gracefully arranged feathers. For a moment the weariness had passed from her face and she was a very beautiful woman. Her features were delicately shaped, her eyes rather deep-set. She had a long, graceful neck, and resting upon her throat, fastened by a thin platinum chain, was a single sapphire. There was about her just that same delicate femininity, that exquisite aroma of womanliness and tender sexuality which had impressed him so much upon their first meeting. She was more wonderful even than his dreams, this rather tired woman of fashion whose coming had been so surprising. He would have answered her question lightly but he found it impossible. A great part of his success in life had been due to his inspiration. He knew perfectly well that she was to be the adventure of his life.

"It is so restful here," she said presently, "and I can't tell you how much I have enjoyed our meeting. But alas!" she added, glancing at her watch, "you see the time—and I am dining out. We will walk to Hyde Park Corner and you must find me a cab."

He rose to his feet at once and they strolled slowly along on the least frequented footpath.

"I hope so much," she went on, "that my husband's connection with the man you dislike will not make any difference. You must meet him, of course—my husband, I mean. You will not like him and he will not understand you, but you need not see much of him. Our ways, unfortunately, have lain apart for some time."

"You have your troubles," he said quietly. "I knew it when you first began to talk to me at Etaples."

"I have my troubles," she admitted. "You will understand them when you know me better. Sometimes I think they are more than I can bear. Tonight I feel inclined to make light of them. It is a great thing to have friends. I have so few."

"I am a little ambitious," he ventured. "I do not wish to take my place among the rank and file. I want to be something different to you in life—more than anyone else. If affection and devotion count, I shall earn my place."

Her eyes were filled with tears as she gave him her hand.

"Indeed," she assured him, "you are there already. You have been there in my thoughts for so long. If you wish to keep your place, you will find very little competition. I am rather a dull woman these days, and I have very little to give."

He smiled confidently as he stopped a taxicab and handed her in.

"May I not be the judge of that?" he begged. "Giving depends upon the recipient, you know. You have given me more happiness within this last half-hour than I have had since we parted in France."

Some instinct of her younger days brought happiness into her laugh, a provocative gleam into her soft eyes.

"You are very easily satisfied," she murmured.

He laughed back again, but though he opened his lips to speak, the words remained unsaid. Something warned him that here was a woman passing through something like a crisis in her life, and that a single false step on his part might be fatal. He stood hat in hand and watched the taxicab turn up Park Lane.

was director of the Little Theater at Chicago—and reached London on June 6.

For six weeks he visited old friends and was preparing to settle down at Grantchester to lecture to undergraduates of Cambridge when the great war began. He was in Norfolk with the Cornfords—Mrs. Cornford was Frances Darwin, granddaughter of Charles Darwin—when he heard the news of the war. "Well, if Armageddon's on," he said with his characteristic eagerness, "I suppose one should be there." Early in September Winston Churchill offered him a commission in the Royal Naval Division; on September 27 he joined the Anson Battalion, and sailed in October for Antwerp. That Brooke matured rapidly is seen in the five sonnets entitled "1914."

In January, 1915, he got the news of the death of James Elroy Flecker, a Cambridge fellow-poet, three years Brooke's senior, who had been on consular service in Turkey and Syria, and died after two years' illness at Davos, Switzerland.

That winter Brooke trained for a short time at Blandford, a camp in Dorsetshire. The division was reviewed by the King on February 25, and three days later sailed on the Grantully Castle with the British Mediterranean Forces for the Dardanelles. In a letter to his mother Rupert expressed a wish, which she later carried out, that any money he left and any profits from his books should be divided among three of his brother poets—Lascelles Abercrombie, Walter de la Mare and Wilfrid Wilson Gibson.

From Malta they went to Lemnos, then to Egypt, where Brooke had a touch of sunstroke. At Port Said he and two companions got a three days' leave and saw the Sphinx and the Pyramids. Sir Ian Hamilton reviewed the division on April 3 and offered Brooke a post on his staff, which Brooke refused. On Saturday, April 17, they landed at Skyros. On Tuesday Brooke was bitten by a fly during a divisional field-day; next day he had a high temperature; and on Thursday the diagnosis was acute blood poisoning, when all hope was given up. It was decided to move him to a French hospital-ship lying at Skyros, and they placed him in the best cabin on the sundeck, where he lay unconscious all day. Toward sunset, his college friend, Denis Browne, sitting by him, he died, "with the sun shining all round his cabin, and the cool sea-breeze blowing through his door and the shaded windows."

He was buried by torchlight the same evening in an olive grove on the hillside of Skyros, a mile from the shore. A white wooden cross with a Greek inscription was erected over the grave. Thus a foreign vale had indeed become a bit of England, and the soldier found, as an American admirer adds:

"In war's last sacrifice a new-won life."

Many poets in many lands have been inspired to lament in verse the passing of this bright spirit in so romantic a setting; probably the best elegy in his honor is from the pen of J. Corson Miller:

AT THE GRAVE OF RUPERT BROOKE

Above his head shy olive-blooms are bending,
To kiss the brave young glory of his face;
The rose and asphodel—their perfume blending—
Make beautiful the place.

The Moon, robed for Night's nuptials, flings him splendor,
In silver showers, from blue AEgea's strand,
For soon again Endymion shall attend her
Through Pan's Arcadian land.

Star-sentries keep for him a watch undying—
Here he doth sleep, where he would wish to be:
With laughing Fauns, and Dryads' light feet flying,
And yonder, lo!—the Sea!

Look! Sappho waves him greeting—Lethe's River
Shall wash away Love's wounds of Earth's red years;

No more for him sharp grief or wistful quiver
Of eyelids gone to tears.
War's clangor hushed for him; the bloody morrow
Was not to be his heritage at last;
Death touched him softly, fled are Pain and Sorrow
Into the curtained past.

The Sirens call with wonder-music, wooing,
Yea, Venus speaks—her lips like ruddy wine—
To bid him ride with Phoebus, gold-bestrewing,
Unto the Muses Nine.

Ay, he hath now a world to fit his dreaming:
The old high gods and heroes of romance;
Calm woodland-ways, where Bacchant-eyes are gleaming,
And gentle Nereids dance.

Across the purple sea-line Neptune's calling,
Far south upshines Minerva's temple-piles;
The orange-breeze blows sweet—the tide is falling
Across the Grecian Isles.

Ye dreamers all, and poets glad with singing,
Idlers at inns and gatherers of fruit—
Wave ye Song's coronal, with blossoms stringing,
For one whom Death made mute.

A few friends have already made a pilgrimage to the hallowed spot, among others John Masefield, who was sent to the Aegean by the Oxford University press to prepare a story of the Gallipoli expedition. Masefield mourns the loss of his friend in two tender sonnets in his "Good Friday" volume:

THE ISLAND OF SKYROS

Here, where we stood together, we three men,
Before the war had swept us to the East
Three thousand miles away, I stand again
And hear the bells, and breathe, and go to feast.
We trod the same path, to the selfsame place,
Yet here I stand, having beheld their graves,
Skyros whose shadows the great seas erase,
And Seddul Bahr that ever more blood craves.
So, since we communed here, our bones have been Nearer, perhaps, than they again will be,
Earth and the world-wide battle lie between,
Death lies between, and friend-destroying sea.
Yet here, a year ago, we talked and stood
As I stand now, with pulses beating blood.

I saw her like a shadow on the sky
In the last light, a blur upon the sea,
Then the gale's darkness put the shadow by,
But from one grave that island talked to me;
And, in the midnight, in the breaking storm,
I saw its blackness and a blinking light,
And thought, "So death obscures your gentle form,
So memory strives to make the darkness bright;
And, in that heap of rocks, your body lies,
Part of the island till the planet ends,
While I, who pass, a little obscure thing,
War with this force, and breathe, and am its king."

Let us hope that the many excellent poetic tributes to the memory of this beloved poet-patriot will be collected and published some day soon, keeping the name of Rupert Brooke fragrant.

ROME ENVOY ORDERED OUT OF MEXICO

[BY A. P. NIGHT WIRE.]

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 14.—An order expelling Monsignor Ernesto Filippi, apostolic delegate, because of his alleged participation in religious ceremonies contrary to Federal laws, was issued tonight by President Obregon. Monsignor Filippi is still in the State of Guanajuato. The Mexico City police have been instructed to apprehend the apostolic delegate within three days.

The order was interpreted in many quarters here today as President Obregon's first important move against asserted Catholic aggressiveness.

"NO VIOLATION"

Monsignor Filippi arrived in Mexico City fourteen months ago as the first apostolic delegate to Mexico in many years. He formerly was stationed in Ottawa, Canada. He is a personal friend of Cardinal Daugherty.

Beyond expressing surprise at his expulsion and describing it as "an incredible proceeding", Monsignor Filippi had little comment to make when he received the correspondent of the Associated Press today.

"There was no violation either of the spirit or the letter of the law in the Cerro el Cubilite ceremony, to which the Mexican government has taken offense," said the prelate. "It was an outdoor service in no sense of the word. I merely blessed the cornerstone, and the entire ceremony took less than twenty minutes.

"I have presided at similar functions numerous times in Mexico, and certainly I had no idea in this instance of setting myself against

CHAPTER I

THE Marchioness of Amesbury was giving a garden party in the spacious but somewhat urban grounds of her mansion in Kensington. Perhaps because it was the first affair of its sort of the season, and perhaps, also, because Cecilia Amesbury had the knack of making friends in every walk of life, it was remarkably well attended. Two stock brokers, Roger Kendrick, and his friend, Maurice White, who had escaped from the city a little earlier than usual, and had shared a taxicab up west, congratulated themselves upon having found a quiet and shady seat where iced drinks were procurable and the crush was not so great.

"Anything doing in your market today?" Kendrick asked his younger associate.

White made a little grimace.

"B. & I., B. & I., all the time," he grumbled. "I'm sick of the name of the damned things. And to tell you the truth, Ken, when a client asks for my advice about them, I don't know what to say."

Kendrick contemplated the tips of his patent boots. He was a well-looking, well-turned-out and well-to-do representative of the occupation which he, his father, and grandfather had followed—ten years older, perhaps, than his companion, but remarkably well-preserved. He had made money and kept it.

"They say that Rockefeller's at the back of them," he remarked.

"They may say what they like but who's to prove it?" his young companion argued. "They must have enormous backing, of course, but until they declare it, I'm not pushing the business. Look at the Board on their merits, Ken."

Roger Kendrick nodded. Every one on the Stock Exchange was interested in B. & I.'s, and he settled himself down comfortably to hear what his companion had to say on the matter.

"There's old Dreadnought Phipps," White continued, "Peter Phipps, to give him his right name. Well, has ever a man who aspires to be considered a financial giant had such a career? He was broken on the New York Stock Exchange, went to Montreal and made a million or so, back to New York, where he got in with the copper lot and no doubt made real money. Then he went for that wheat corner in Chicago. He got out of that with another fortune, though they say he sold his fellow-directors. Now he turns up here, chairman of the B. & I. who must have bought £50,000,000 worth of wheat already this year. Well, unless he's considerably out of his depth, he must have some one else's money to play with besides his own."

"Let me see, who are the other directors?" Kendrick inquired.

"Well, there's young Stanley Rees, Phipps' nephew, who came in for £300,000 a few years ago," Maurice White answered, "old skinflint Martin, who may be worth half a million but certainly not more; and Dredlinton. Dredlinton's rabbit, of course. He hasn't got a bob. There's money enough among the rest for any ordinary business undertaking, if only one could understand what the mischief they were up to. They can't corner wheat in this country."

"I wonder," Kendrick murmured. "The harvests last year were bad all over the world, you know, and this year, except in the States and Canada, they will be worse. With another fifty million it might be done."

"But they're taking deliveries," White pointed out. "They have granaries all over the kingdom, and subsidiary companies to do the dirty work of refusing to sell. Already they say that three-quarters of the wheat of the country is in their hands, and mind you, they sell nothing. The price goes up and up, just the same as the price of their shares has risen. They buy but they never sell. Some of the big banks must be helping, of course, but I know one or two—one in particular—who decline to handle any business from them at all."

"I should say their greatest risk was government interference," Kendrick observed. "Gambling in foodstuffs ought to be forbidden."

"It would take our government a year to make up their minds what to do," White scoffed, "and by that time these fellows would have sold out and be on to something else."

"Well, it's too hot for shop," Kendrick yawned. "I think I shall cut work on Friday and have a long week-end at Sandwich."

"I have a good mind to do the same," his companion declared. "And as to B. & I. There's money to be made out of them one way or the other, but I shall advise my clients not to touch them.—Hullo, we're discovered! Here's Sarah."

The young lady in question, escorted by a pink-complexioned, somewhat bored-looking young man, who cheered up at the sight of the iced drinks, greeted the two friends with a smile. She was attired in the smartest of garden-party frocks, her brown eyes were clear and attractive, her complexion freckled but pleasant, her mouth humorous a suggestion which was further carried out by her slightly retrousse nose. She seemed to bring with her an agreeable atmosphere of wholesome things.

"You shall advise your clients not to touch what?" she inquired. "Are there any tips going?"

Kendrick shook his head.

"You stick to the tips your clients slip into your hand, my dear young lady," he advised, "and don't dabble in what you don't understand. The Stock Exchange is a den of thieves, and Maurice here and I are two of the worst examples."

Miss Sarah Baldwin made a little grimace.

"My clients are such a mean lot," she complained. "Now that they have got over the novelty of being driven in a taxicab by a woman, they are positively stingy. Even Jimmy here only gave me a sovereign for picking him up at St. James' street, waiting twenty minutes at his tailor's, and bringing him on here. What is it that you're going to advise your clients to leave alone, please, Mr. White?"

"British and Imperial Granaries."

The young man—the Hon. James Wilshaw—suddenly dropped his eyeglass and assumed an anxious expression.

"I say, what's wrong with them, White?" he demanded. "They're large holders of wheat, and wheat's going up all the time."

"Wheat's going up because they're buying," was the dry comment. "Directly they leave off it will drop, and when it begins to drop, look out for a slump in B. & I.'s."

The young man relapsed into a seat by Sarah's side and swung an immaculately trousered leg.

"But look here, Maurice, my boy, why should they leave off buying, eh?" he inquired.

"Because," the other explained, "there is a little more wheat in the world than the B. & I. have money for."

"I can give you a further reason," Kendrick intervened, "for leaving B. & I.'s severely alone. There is at the present moment on his way to this country—if he is not already here, by the by—one of the shrewdest and finest speculators in the world, who is coming over on purpose to do what up to now our own men seem to have funked—fight the B. & I. tooth and nail."

"Who's that, Ken?" Maurice White asked with interest. "Why haven't I heard about him before?"

"Because," Kendrick replied, "he wrote and told me that he was coming and marked his letter 'Private,' so I thought that I had better keep it to myself. His boat was due in Liverpool several days ago, though, so I suppose that any one who is interested knows all about his coming by this time."

"But his name?" Sarah demanded. "Why don't you tell us his name and all about him? I love American millionaires who do things in Wall Street and fight with billions. If he's really nice, he may take me off your hands, Jimmy."

"I'd like to see him try," that young man growled, with unexpected fierceness.

"Well, his name is John Philip Wingate," Kendrick told them. "He started life, I believe, as a journalist. Then he inherited a fortune and made another one on Wall Street, where I imagine he came across Dreadnought Phipps. What happened I don't really know," he went on ruminatively. "Phipps couldn't have squeezed him, or we should have heard about it, but somehow or other the two got at loggerheads, for it's common knowledge among their business connections—I don't know that they have any friends—that Wingate has sworn to break Phipps. There will be quite a commotion in the city when it gets about that Wingate is here or on his way over."

"It's almost like a romance," Sarah declared, as she took the ice which her cavalier had brought her and settled down once more in her chair. "Tell me more about Mr. Wingate, please. Mr. Phipps I know, of course, and he doesn't seem in the least terrifying. Is Mr. Wingate like that or is he a dourer type?"

"John Wingate," Kendrick said reflectively, "is a much younger man than Phipps—I should say that he wasn't more than 35—and much better looking. I must say that in a struggle I shouldn't know which to back. Wingate has sentiment and Phipps has none; conscience of which Phipps hasn't a shred, and a sense of honor with which Phipps was certainly never troubled. These points are all against him in a market duel, but on the other hand he has a bigger outlook than Phipps, he has nerves of steel and the grit of a hero. Did I tell you, by the by, that he went into the war as a private and came out a brigadier?"

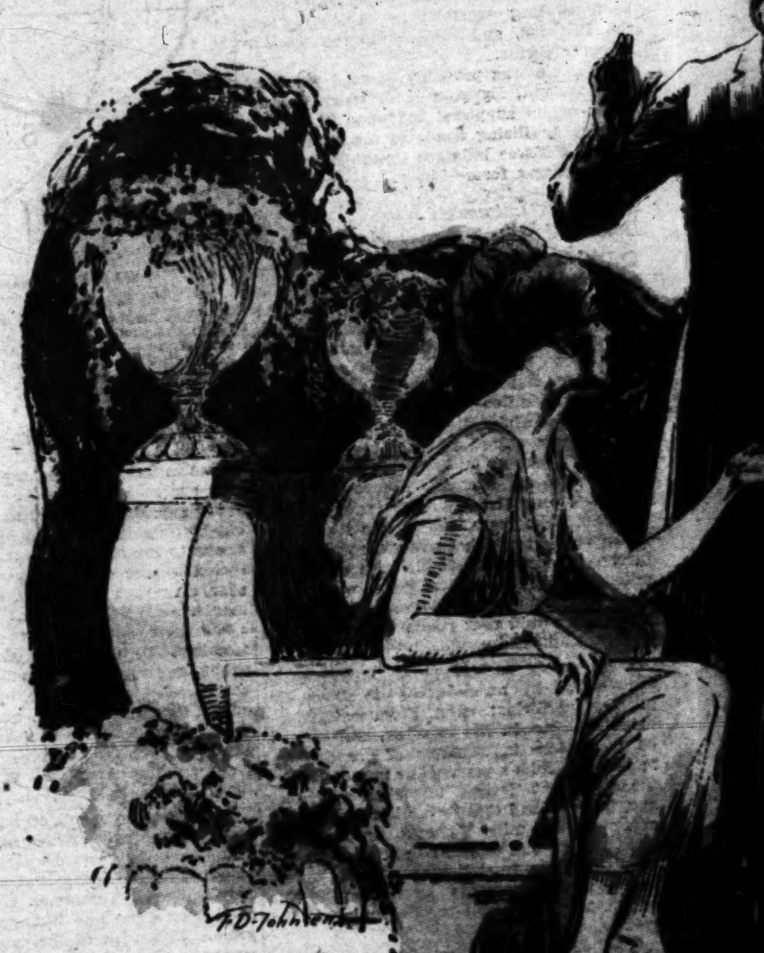
"Splendid!" Sarah murmured. "Now tell me where Peter Phipps comes in?"

"Well," Kendrick continued, "Phipps attracts sympathy because of his lavish hospitality and apparent generosity, while Wingate is a man of many reserves and has few friends, either on this side or the other. Then Phipps, I should say, is the wealthier man, and in this present deal, at any rate, he has marvelous support, so that financially he must tower over Wingate. Then, too, I think he understands the tricks of the market better over here, and he has a very dangerous confederate in Skinflint Martin. What that old blackguard doesn't know of chicanery and crooked dealing, the devil himself couldn't make use of. If he's put his own money into B. & I., I should say that Phipps can't be broken. My advice to Wingate, at any rate, when we meet, will be to stand by for a time."

The sound of approaching voices warned them that their seclusion was on the point of being broken into. Their hostess, an elderly lady of great social gifts and immense volubility, appeared, having for her escort a tall, well-groomed man of youthful middle age, with the square jaw and humorous gleam in his gray eyes of the best trans-Atlantic type. Lady Amesbury beamed upon them all.

"Just the people I was looking for!" she exclaimed. "I want you all to know my great friend, Mr. Wingate from New York."

Every one was glad to meet Wingate, and Kendrick and he exchanged the greetings of old friends.



"Now you have found some one whom you can talk to, my dear John," his hostess declared. "I shall consider you off my hands for the afternoon. Come and dine with me next Sunday night, and don't lose your heart to Sarah Baldwin. She's a capricious little minx, and, besides, she's engaged to Jimmy there, though heaven knows whether they'll ever get married.—There! I knew it! My own particular Bishop being lured into conversation with Hidda Sutton, who's just become a freethinker and can't talk of anything else. It will spoil the dear man's afternoon if she gets really started. Good-by, all of you. Take care of Mr. Wingate."

She hurried off, and the newcomer seated himself between Kendrick and Sarah.

"We've just been hearing all about you, Mr. Wingate," Sarah began, "but I must say you're the last person we expected to see here. We imagined you dashing in a great motor-car from Liverpool to your office in the city, dictating letters, speaking into the telephone, and doing all sorts of violent things. I don't believe Mr. Kendrick told us the truth about you at all."

Wingate smiled good-humoredly.

"Tell me what Kendrick has been saying, and I will let you know whether it is the truth or not," he promised.

Maurice White held out his hands in horror. "My dear young lady," he exclaimed, "such questions are absolutely impossible!"

"Well, he has just given us a thrilling picture of you," she went on, coming over here armed cap-a-pie to do battle for the romance of money. Already we were picturing to ourselves poor Dreadnought Phipps, the first of your victims, seeking for an asylum in the Stock Exchange Almshouses; and the other desperado—what was his name? Skinflint Martin?—on his knees before you while you read him a moral lecture on the evils of speculation."

Wingate's eyes twinkled.

"From all of which I judge that you have been discussing the British and Imperial Granaries," he remarked.

"Our dear young friend, Miss Baldwin," Kendrick said, "has a vivid imagination and a wonderful gift of picturesque similes. Still, I have just been telling them that one reason why I wouldn't touch B. & I.'s is because they have an idea over here that you are going to have a shy at them."

"My attitude toward the company in question is certainly an unfriendly one," Wingate admitted. "I hate all speculations the basis of which is utterly selfish. Dealing in foodstuffs is one of them. But, Miss Baldwin," he went on, turning towards her, "why do we talk finance on such a wonderful afternoon, and so far away from the city? I really came over from the States to get an occasional cocktail, order some new clothes and see some plays. What theaters do you advise me to go to?"

"I can tell you plenty," she answered, "which I should advise you to stay away from. It is quite easy to see, Mr. Wingate, that you have been away from London quite a long time. You are not in the least in touch with us. On the Stock Exchange they do little, nowadays, I am told, but invent stories which the members can tell only to other men's wives, and up in the west we do little else except talk finance. The money we used to lose at auction bridge now all goes to our brokers. We worry the lives out of our men friends by continually craving for tips."

"Dear me," Wingate remarked, "I had no idea things were as bad as that."

"Now what," Sarah asked ingratiatingly, "is your honest opinion about British and Imperial Granaries?"

"If I gave it to you," Wingate replied, "my opinion would be the only honest thing about it."

"Then couldn't one do some good by selling a bear of them?" she inquired sagely.

"You would do yourself and every one else more good by not dealing in them at all," Wingate advised. "The whole thing is a terrible gamble."

"When did you arrive" Kendrick inquired. "Have you been in the city yet?"

Wingate shook his head.

"I have spent the last two days in the north of England," he replied. "I was rather interested in having a glance at conditions there. I only arrived in London last night."

"But this morning?" Sarah asked him. "You don't mean to tell me that you had strength of mind enough to keep away from the city?"

"I certainly do. I did not even telephone to my brokers. Kendrick here knows that, for he is one of the firm."

"Then what did you do?" Sarah persisted. "I can't imagine you spending your first morning in idleness."

"You might have called it idleness; I didn't," he answered, smiling. "I had my hair cut and my nails manicured; I was measured for four new suits of clothes, a certain number of shirts, and I bought some other indispensable trifles."

"Dear me," Sarah murmured, "you aren't at all the sort of man I thought you were!"

"Why not?"

"You don't seem energetic. I should have thought, even if you weren't supposed to buy or sell, that you would have been all round the markets, inquiring about B. & I.'s this morning."

"I read the papers instead," he replied. "One can learn a good deal from the papers."

"You will find rather a partial press where B. & I.'s are concerned," Kendrick observed.

"I have already noticed it," was the brief reply. "Still, even the press must live, I suppose."

"Cynic!" Sarah murmured.

"Might one ask, without being impertinent," Maurice White inquired, addressing Wingate for the first time, "what is your real opinion concerning the directors of the B. & I?"

Wingate answered him deliberately.

"I am scarcely a fair person to ask," he paid, "because Peter Phipps is a personal enemy of mine. However, since you have asked the question, I should say that Phipps is utterly unscrupulous and possesses every qualification of a blackguard. Rees, his nephew, is completely under his thumb, occupying just the position he might be supposed to hold. Skinflint Martin ought to have died in penal servitude years ago, and as for Dredlinton—"

Wingate was quick to scent disaster. He broke off abruptly in his sentence just as a tall, pale, beautifully gowned woman who had detached herself from a group close at hand turned toward them.

"It is Lady Dredlinton," Kendrick whispered in his ear.

"Then I will only say," Wingate concluded, "that Lord Dredlinton's commercial record scarcely entitles him to a seat on the board of any progressive company."

CHAPTER II

Josephine Dredlinton, with a smile which gave to her face a singularly sweet expression, deprecated the disturbance which her coming had caused amongst the little company. The four men had risen to their feet. Kendrick was holding a chair for her. She apparently knew everyone intimately except Wingate, and Sarah hastened to present him.

"Mr. Wingate—the Countess of Dredlinton," she said. "Mr. Wingate has just arrived from New York, Josephine, and he wants to know which are the newest plays worth seeing and the latest mode in men's ties."

A somewhat curious few seconds followed upon Sarah's few words of introduction. Wingate stood drawn to his fullest height, having the air of a man who, on the point of making his little conventional movement and speech, has felt the influence of some emotion in itself almost paralyzing. His eyes searched the face of the woman before whom he stood, almost eagerly, as though he were conjuring up to himself pictures of her in some former state and trying to reconcile them with her present appearance. She, on her side, seemed to be realizing some secret and indefinable pleasure. The lines of her beautiful mouth, too often, nowadays, weary and drooping, softened into a quiet, almost mysterious smile. Her eyes—very large and wonderful eyes they were—seemed to hold some other vision than the vision of this tall, forceful-looking man. It was a moment which no one, perhaps, except those two themselves realized. To the lookers-on it seemed only a meeting between two very distinguished and attractive-looking people, naturally interested in each other.

"It is a great pleasure to meet Lady Dredlinton," Wingate said. "I hope that Miss Baldwin's remark will not prejudice me in your opinion. I am really not such a frivolous person as she would have you believe."

"Even if you were," she rejoined, sinking into the chair which had been brought for her, "a little frivolity from men, nowadays, is rather in order, isn't it?"

"It's all very well for those who can afford to indulge in it," Kendrick grumbled. "We can't earn our bread and butter now on the Stock Exchange. Even our friend Maurice here, who works as long as an hour and a half a day sometimes, declares that he can barely afford his new Rolls-Royce."

"You men are so elusive about your prospects," Sarah declared. "I believe that Jimmy could afford to marry me tomorrow if he'd only make up his mind to it."

"I'm ready to try, anyhow," the young man assured her promptly. "Girls nowadays talk so much rot about giving up their liberty."

"Once a taxicab driver, always a taxicab driver," Sarah propounded. "Did you know that that was my profession, Mr. Wingate? If you do need anything in the shape of a comfortable conveyance while you are in town, will you remember me? I'll send you a card, if you like."

"Don't, for heaven's sake, listen to that young woman," Kendrick begged.

"Her cab's on its last legs," the Honorable Jimmy warned him, "three cylinders missing, and the fourth makes a noise like popcorn when you come to a gradient."

"It isn't as though she could drive," Maurice White put in. "There isn't an insurance company in London will take her on as a risk.'

Sarah glanced from one to the other in well-assumed viciousness.

"Don't I hate you all!" she exclaimed bitterly. "I can understand Jimmy, because he likes me to drive him all the time, but you others, who aren't regular clients at all, why you should butt in and try to spoil my chances, I can't think. Mr. Wingate is just my conception of the ideal fare—generous, affable, and with trans-Atlantic notions about tips. I shall send you my card, all the same, Mr. Wingate."

"And I hope," Josephine said, "that Mr. Wingate will not take the slightest notice of all the rubbish these unkind people have been saying. Miss Baldwin drives me continually and has given me every satisfaction."

"'Every satisfaction' I love," Sarah declared. "I shall have that framed."

"Any chance of your taking me back to the Milan?" Wingate inquired.

Sarah shook her head regretfully, glancing down at her muslin gown.

"Can't you see I'm in my party clothes?" she said. "I did bring the old 'bus down here, but I had a boy meet me and take it away. I'll send you my card and telephone number, Mr. Wingate. You can rely upon my punctuality and dispatch. Even my aunt here would give me a reference, if pressed," she added, as their hostess paused for a moment to whisper something in Josephine's ear.

"Your driving's like your life, dear, much too fast for my liking," Lady Amesbury d
